House memorial 2 to the Congress of the United States asking that the cotton tax collected from 1860 to 1868 be returned to the governors of the respective States from which it was collected, and providing for its distribution among the claimants upon proof of said claims.

Whereas there was collected by our Federal Government during the years 1860 to 1867 a large tax on raw cotton; and

Whereas it is within our opinion that moneys derived from said tax should be returned to the governors of the respective States from which it was collected, same to be placed in the State treasury and distributed among the claimants upon proof of said claims: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida, That the Congress of the United States is hereby requested to return said moneys.

Resolved further, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to use all honorable means to secure the passage of a bill carrying out the purpose of this memorial.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be directed to furnish each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of this memorial under the great seal of the State of Florida.

House memorial 4, requesting the Members of Congress to use their efforts to have suitable laws passed deporting foreigners who claimed exemption and were exempt from military service in the recent war against German autocracy on the ground that they were subjects of and gave allegiance to foreign countries.

Whereas during the recent titanic struggle to banish from the earth German militarism, when practically all of the great nations of the world were in a death grapple, our great Republic entered the conflict to do battle for the rights of humanity, that American privileges, liberties, and rights might be made safe, that the glorious traditions of our beloved country might be upheld and defended; and

Whereas our Government called into its service thousands of loyal, red-blooded, and patriotic Americans, who answered the summons unflinchingly and without murmur or complaint, glad to take up arms in defense of their homeland; and

Whereas at that time there was scattered throughout this country thousands of able-bodied foreigners who claimed exemption from military service on the ground that they were subjects of and gave allegiance to a foreign country; and

Whereas these very foreigners who claimed and were granted such exemption came to our shores for the purpose of reaping the manifold benefits of a free country and to have the assurance of our constitutional liberties, which they were accorded, skulked like cowards they were, behind their foreign citizenship and their allegiance to foreign powers when America, the land in which they lived, called them to its defense, and, claiming exemption on that ground, they remained at home on American soil in safety and security, reaping the benefits of good positions and, in many instances, with high wages, while red-blooded young Americans, the very manhood of our Nation, went to battle and gave their lives in defense of our great American Republic and its traditions; and

Whereas these yellow-streaked aliens sneaked behind their foreign citizenship to escape a duty they owed America, the country in which they lived and which guaranteed to them freedom and protection, should be deported as so much worthless scum and baggage, thereby relieving this country of such undesirable and miserable slackers in order to properly show America's contempt for such ingrates and as a tribute to the glory of American arms and the valor and courage of America's red-blooded fighting men: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida, That our Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested and urged to exercise every honorable means to have Congress enact proper laws carrying out the intent of this memorial; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Florida be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish each of our Representatives in the National Congress, under the great seal of the State of Florida, certified copies of this memorial.

Approved May 14, 1919.

[SEAL.] H. CLAY CRAWFORD.
Secretary of State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition of 500 or 600 citizens in different parts of Illinois, referring to the league of nations, which I ask to have referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. OVERMAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Transylvania County, N. C., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty unless certain reservations and amendments are adopted which will preserve American fundamental principles, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Republican Club of Detroit, Mich., praying for the return to private ownership of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commcrce.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Jackson, Kalamazoo, and Allenville, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Charles A. Larned Post, No. 1, American Legion, of Detroit, Mich., and a petition of Saginaw Post, No. 22, American Legion, of Saginaw, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Sweet bill providing for the lump-sum payment of war-risk insurance, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Judson E. Ingram Post, No. 80, American Legion, of Houghton, Mich., praying for universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry postal clerks of Tacoma, Wash., and of sundry third and fourth class postmasters of Curtis, Oologah, El Reno, Altus, Chickasha, and Miami, in the State of Oklahoma, praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Heliotrope Rebekah Lodge, No. 183, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Pomona, Calif., and a petition of Local Union No. 88, Lathers International Union, of Oakland, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Hokah, Minn., remonstrating against the establishment of a Department of Education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of C. L. Bennit, of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the repeal of the tax on spectacles and eyeglasses, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I present resolutions adopted by the Detroit Republican Club, of Detroit, Mich, remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called "Plumb plan" for the control and operations of railroads. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted September 18, 1919.

Whereas representatives of the several railroad brotherhoods have made demands upon the Government of the United States to the effect that the railroads should be purchased by the Government and should be operated for the joint benefit of the railroad employees mostly, the public incidentally; and

Whereas this demand, in form of the so-called Plumb plan, was accompanied with an implied threat that unless promptly acceded to a universal strike would be called to coerce the Government into acceptance thereof; and

Whereas during the recent war the experience under Government control and operation of our rail and transportation lines resulted in a demonstration of higher cost, unsatisfactory service, and low efficiency; and

Whereas this demand would establish a railroad employees' aristocracy, the only object of which is control of the great railroad transportation systems for the benefit of about one-half of 1 per cent of our population to the detriment of the other 99½ per cent, and would further increase the cost of living; and

Whereas statistics furnished by the Director General of the Railroad Administration show that railroad employees receive as much as $385 in wages per month, or about $4,700 per year, which is more than the remuneration of high-class professional men, mechanics, and others after years of training without pay; and

Whereas our Government under the Constitution is not one of paternalism nor nationalism, and the railroad brotherhoods' suggestions are entirely along class lines and their demands carry a threat practically of revolution: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Detroit Republican Club strongly opposes the demands of the Plumb plan and its sponsors, and we join with the labor and business interests of our country in calling upon the President and Congress to resist such demands at any cost; and be it

Resolved, That we request that the railroads be returned to their owners; that we favor the enactment of laws providing for private ownership and operation under strict Government control, with the prohibition of speculation and manipulation of stocks, bonds, and other railroad securities, providing for the highest wages possible commensurate with adequate service and efficiency; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary be, and he is hereby, instructed to forward a copy of these resolution to the Senators from Michigan, Congressman CHARLES A. NICHOLS, and the daily papers.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I also present a memorial signed by six bishops of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, praying for an investigation into the recent race riots in Washington, D. C., Chicago, Ill., and Knoxville, Tenn. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A memorial.

To the Congress of the United States:

The Commission on After-War Problems of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, representing a religious organization numbering a million communicants and adherents, now in the one hundred and third year of its denominational existence, prompted by a sense of stern duty, respectfully directs your attention to the solemn and ominous statements which characterize the following poem, printed in the September issue of a magazine published by colored people in New York City:

"IF WE MUST DIE!

"If we must die, let it not be like hogs
Hunted and penned in an inglorious spot,
While round us bark the mad and hungry dogs,
Making their mock at our accursed lot.
If we must die, oh, let us nobly die
So that our precious blood may not be shed
In vain; then even the monsters we defy
Shall be constrained to honor us, though dead!

"Oh, kinsmen! We must meet the common foe;
Though far outnumbered, let us still be brave,
And for their thousand blows deal one deathblow!
What though before us lies the open grave?
Like men we'll face the murderous, cowardly pack,
Pressed to the wall, dying, but—fighting back!"

Though the poem is the production of a West Indian negro, a native of Jamaica, it nevertheless reflects the conviction of a large group of American citizens of African descent—a group who feel that death is preferable to a state halfway between slavery and freedom. This group has sworn by the blood of their kinsmen who fell on the battle fields of France, in a death grip with the foe, to help make the world safe for democracy, that they will no longer tamely submit to a denial of the rights guaranteed them by the National Constitution.

This does not mean that they intend to go around with a chip on the shoulder seeking for trouble; that they mean to be needlessly offensive; that they will provoke a conflict, or that they intend to resort to force to secure a fair measure of righteous justice. Not at all. It means that they will pursue the path of peace, imposing on themselves the virtue of self-restraint to the limit, impelled by the lofty purpose to agitate for a better understanding between the races. They will demand a hearing at the bar of public opinion.

It is quite certain, however, that the fulminating of the archaic and vicious dogma, "This is a white man's country," which of late has been resurrected, will not conduce to a better understanding between the races. Moreover, when Gen. Lee surrendered his sword to the commander of the triumphant armies of freedom at Appomattox, that dogma fell a shattered idol.

This year is the ter-centenary of the coming of our forebears to this country, which antedates by a year the coming of the Pilgrim Fathers. Our claim to an equitable ownership of this country is attested by three centuries of toil for its development and expansion, as well as by heroic deeds and sacrifices in its defense on fields of sanguinary conflict from Bunker Hill to Metz. We are here, and here to stay—not as aliens or pariahs but as a bona fide and integral part of the body politic. Our supreme desire is to be allowed to exercise our inalienable rights without let or hindrance, to prove a strong prop in the support of American institutions, and to continue a helpful factor in the development of American industry.

We most earnestly pray the Congress to make diligent inquiry as to the underlying cause of the race riots at Washington, D. C., Chicago, Ill., and Knoxville, Tenn., with the view of formulating such suggestions for adoption by the people as, in your judgment, may prove a safeguard against similar outbreaks in the future, and also lead to the establishment of a more friendly relationship between the races.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Charles S. Smith, chairman, Detroit, Mich., bishop, American Episcopal Church; John R. Hawkins, secretary, Washington, D. C., financial secretary, American Methodist Episcopal Church; Joseph S. Flipper, Atlanta, Ga., bishop, American Methodist Episcopal Church; J. Albert Johnson, Baltimore, Md., bishop, American Methodist Episcopal Church; William H. Heard, Jackson, Miss., bishop, American Methodist Episcopal Church; John Hurst, Jacksonville, Fla., bishop, American Methodist Episcopal Church; William D. Chappelle, Columbia, S. C., bishop, American Methodist Episcopal Church; Richard R. Wright, jr., Savannah, Ga., editor Christian Recorder, American Methodist Episcopal Church; Arthur S. Jackson, Waco, Tex., secretary of education, American Methodist Episcopal Church.

DETROIT, MICH., September 22, 1919.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented memorials of sundry citizens of Bay City, Pontiac, Cassopolis, Reed City, Fremont, Maple Rapids, Manton, Bad Axe, Dundee, Lake City, Coldwater, and Charlevoix, all in the State of Michigan remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2085) relating to the maintenance of actions for death on the high seas and other navigable waters, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 216) thereon.

MINNESOTA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment (H. R. 9091) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Hennepin to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Minnesota River. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county of Hennepin, in the State of Minnesota, and its successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Minnesota River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near the intersection of that certain public highway in said county commonly known and designated as Lyndale Avenue, with the said Minnesota River, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the county of Hennepin, in the State of Minnesota, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Minnesota River."

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. For the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce, with an amendment, the bill (S. 2910) to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild, reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee," approved April 5, 1916, and I submit a report (No. 217) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 5, after the word "rebuild," to insert "and," so as to make the section read:

That the act approved April 5, 1916, authorizing the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near the city of Chattanooga, Tenn., be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted: Provided, That this act shall be null and void unless the actual construction of the bridge be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to revive and reenact the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee,' approved April 5, 1916."

R. 3184) to create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power, for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto, to repeal section 18 of "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved August 8, 1917, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

LABOR STRIKES.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following resolution (S. Res. 190), and as I have not had time to put it in proper condition for the Secretary to read I beg the privilege of reading it myself:

Whereas the right of citizens to organize for the promotion of their views and the improvement of their condition and to utilize all means to the attainment of their ends which are consonant with law, justice, and the limitations of the Constitution; and

Whereas this right, long exercised and enjoyed, for some time past has been and is being utilized oppressively, unjustly, and for the accomplishment of aims and objects wholly repugnant to free institutions and to the inalienable rights of the citizen, thus promoting riot, restraining trade and commerce, overthrowing law and destroying order, and imperiling the lives and limbs of the people of States and communities: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we view with deep concern and disapproval all combinations, conspiracies, and disturbances designed to accomplish objects, lawful or unlawful, by frauds, force, disorder, or resort to other criminal methods.

That in America every citizen, in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, has the constitutional right to follow any calling or to refrain therefrom, as he may choose. That this right is mutual and universal, any denial of or interference with which is wholly contrary to free institutions and individual liberty.

That the so-called "closed shop," the denial to the citizen of the right to a livelihood for the support of himself and family free from limitations imposed upon him outside the law are tyrannous, un-American, and wholly in conflict with the fundamentals of American freedom.

That so-called strikes for power, paralyzing business, interfering with distribution, lowering production, defying the laws, and necessarily resulting in riot, insurrection, murder, and the destruction of property are conspiracies in restraint of trade, and should be prevented whenever possible and resisted at all times.

That no person, association, or corporation can be safely or constitutionally exempted or excluded from the obligations, penalties, and prohibitions of general laws enacted for the public safety and welfare.

To-morrow, Mr. President, when an appropriate occasion offers itself, I shall submit some remarks upon the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Colorado will lie over under the rule.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I offer a resolution, for which I ask present consideration. I ought to say a word of explanation in regard to it. It is to print 98 additional copies of Senate Document No. 51, with maps, entitled "The Treaty of Peace with Germany." The maps had to be brought from Paris. Copies of the treaty with the maps have already been furnished to all the Senators, but there are still 98 complete sets of the maps remaining at the Printing Office. I ask for the adoption of this resolution in order that the 98 copies with all maps may be published, which will give each Senator one additional copy of the treaty with maps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 191) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 98 additional copies of Senate Document No. 51, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, entitled "Treaty of Peace with Germany," with maps, for the use of the Senate document room.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I present a letter signed by numerous citizens of Louisiana in regard to the league of nations. I think it fairly represents the sentiment of the people of the State of Louisiana, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VIVIAN, LA., September 20, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD J. GAY,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Your entire constituency are very anxious that you bring all of the pressure that you can command to bring about the ratification of the peace treaty and covenant at the earliest possible moment.

Believing as we do that humanity, commerce, industry, and labor and the whole social order urgently needs speedy ratification, the delay has already been too long.

We believe that you are working to this end, but wanted to let you know our wishes in the matter.

We remain,

Yours, very respectfully,

H. H. Huckaby, merchant; C. H. Thurmond; Daniel Crowe, postmaster; C. J. Lawton, merchant; T. H. Brown; L. C. Butler; J. P. Wilson, merchant; Vivian State Bank; J. A. Caldwell; Bank of Vivian; J. D. Houston; W. T. Adams.

Mr. MOSES. I have received a letter from a former member of this body, Hon. Henry W. Blair, of New Hampshire, who served in the Senate 30 years ago, making valuable suggestions to the Senate for the consideration of the treaty of peace. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 22, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE H. MOSES,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: Suggestions for world policy of the United States for present consideration:

Let the proposed treaty, league of nations, and covenant fail or be so modified as to suit the United States, regardless of party. The President and all of us have been imposed upon enough to justify if not to require this.

Let all the secret treaties and understandings to which any of the allies or enemies are, or have been, parties be made public and carried out if they think best, so far as any of them desire to attempt it, provided there be no injury done to the United States or interests she may feel bound to uphold and defend, in honor, or the dictates of humanity, or by responsibility already incurred.

Treat all negotiations and understandings and proposals involved in the existing international status as null and void so far as the United States is concerned unless the following condition is made fundamental and indispensable—alone securing ultimately everything, without it nothing, to wit:

The adoption and maintenance in each nation of a system of free public instruction and education in all the common branches of knowledge useful in the affairs of this life, including the nature of the different forms of government and of the rights and duties of citizenship under the several forms, especially of autocracy and democracy, so that every child in the world ultimately shall have opportunity to acquire that degree of intelligence and virtue necessary in a government of the people, by the people. Such systems of public schools and education shall be preferably nonsectarian, and shall inculcate the principle of toleration in all matters of religious belief and practice, so that the religious as well as civil liberty may prevail among the people of all nations, whatever may be their general faith, if any be prescribed by custom or local law.

Autocracy is force, and the simplest of all forms of government; democracy is intelligence of the majority, and the most complex of all forms of government.

The majority of the people must know enough to govern themselves or mankind must forever submit to autocracy or to anarchy.

The proposed peace has no foundation stone. It is built upon the sand and shall fall because it is not founded upon the rock of the education of the masses of the people, without which democratic government is impossible.

Such a peace is active preparation for final slavery or still greater wars. The education of the masses of the people is the supreme issue in the whole world. A treaty with China would accomplish the whole thing. Yielding to all other nations the right to make treaties as they please not injurious to the United States or the general principles of humanity, the United States reserves untrammeled the right to enter into any treaty or alliance with the Republic of China which may be agreeable to both Republics, to resist encroachments upon or violation of the rights of and for the maintenance and promotion of the democratic form of government in either or in any other nation, and to that end to make war or peace, which treaty may endure for the necessary period of time. Such a treaty might be analogous, but preferably public, to the treaty entered into secretly between Great Britain and Japan when both these nations were interested in China, but were apprehensive of Russian power. With such a treaty all three will let the Republic of China alone. It is safe to say that if such a treaty had been entered into by the United States and China when I most strongly urged it upon former President Taft there would have been no recent wars in the Orient and probably no World War during the last four years.

All other nations would have taken notice and would have kept the peace. Germany sought world power in China as much as in Europe. She wanted both or no present war.

China and the United States combined would and will hold this world in peace as nothing else will do it. Treaties do not require or often if ever result in the comingling of citizenship or social relations, much less in the assimilation of nations or races.

China has cheap labor, which is capital, and 50,000,000 fighting men, many good officers, and all the resources for overwhelming armies and navies.

The United States has all that China lacks. Capital and educated labor, without which capital is nothing, the best army and coming the best navy. Her officers are inferior to none. They can train the 50,000,000 of men into unflinching fighting masses for the battle field, and China has not yet forgotten the American record of two generations ago nor the Boxer War and American generosity.

Both these nations want peace and united they will have it. And again North and South America, thanks to the Monroe doctrine and the canal and increasing intercourse, are forever one.

We shall not fight Mexico, but we shall keep order, feed her people, and give them schools, work, and better pay. Then, we shall vacate, and God bless her. We shall always be friends if she will let us, but we must have real peace or fight.

Japan has cheap labor, China five times more. Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia have more than enough else to do, and Japan will soon remember our early love and how she became great. She will cease to worship a man as her people study in the common school. Then, she will be free, indeed.

seeking peace, not war. And with China secure we shall help them all the more, including Germany, who disciplined our armies until we overthrew Burgoyne alone, when Cilley, of New Hampshire, swore his artillery into our service on the battle field of Saratoga. And France then gave her armies to avenge the loss of Canada and the Empire of India, 15 years before the Bourbon died in 1793. Lafayette was not France, but he led the spirit of young France into the fatherly arms of Washington.

Who can now pass the neglected statue of Steuben and not weep. We did not fight the Germany of Luther and liberty, nor our comrades in the Civil War. There is or there shall be a new Germany, but the Hohenzollern spirit must die.

Yet how can you get full reparation of the damage done by great nations from the fragments of such nations after they are cut up into exempted allied States. All such questions will be solved by the all prevailing sense of justice when once the Hohenzollern is dead.

Then shall be ushered in the day when—

> All crimes shall cease and ancient fraud shall fail,
> Returning justice lift aloft her scale,
> Peace o'er the world her olive wand extend
> And white-robed innocence from heaven descend.

To the above it should perhaps be added that education includes character, as well as facts and science. Also, that with a wisdom born of 2,000 years of accumulated Christian discretion in constant action, the Pope in a recent letter, published about the 8th instant, to Cardinal Lucan has thrown the tremendous influence of the Catholic Church in favor of democracy which is the destruction of autocracy, for that destruction is possible only where the common school and toleration of religious faith are the fundamental law of the land, thus indorsing the leading proposition of these suggestions and ending the long dispute which has separated the two great divisions of Christianity.

Does this mean even more? Will those divisions disappear in a restored and more glorious union than ever prevailed before, just as our Civil War was the birth of liberty for all the nations of the earth? Who knows? Be not faithless but believing.

Moreover, it should be remembered that the common people of all nations and races have fought side by side with those of the highest civilization, nine-tenths of whom were educated only in the common school. The victims of autocracy all know that the common school has made the difference between them. They will tell their neighbors what they have seen and know, and their neighbors will believe them. Every returning soldier of the oppressed and defective races is now worth 10 missionaries, although the missionary sowed the seed of it all—the Almighty God furnishing the seed.

HENRY W. BLAIR.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a letter dated September 11, 1919, from the Mount Clemens News Bureau sent out to various papers in Illinois, soliciting an exchange with them and offering the service. It is a short communication, and I wish to have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOUNT CLEMENS, MICH., September 11, 1919.

To all editors receiving Mount Clemens News Bureau League of Nations Service:

The Mount Clemens News Bureau would appreciate the courtesy of being included in your exchange list during the time that you are receiving its service on President Wilson's tour in behalf of the league of nations.

Comments on the service are invited. It is the desire of the bureau to furnish plate-using newspapers with a timely and complete report of the President's tour and any suggestions which will assist us in giving you better service will be appreciated.

Yours, very truly,

MOUNT CLEMENS NEWS BUREAU,
D. D. MARTIN, Editor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present an article from the Manufacturers' Record, published in Baltimore, Md., referring to the league of nations, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AS A MORAL ISSUE.

[By Eugene Thwing.]

(That the request of American ministers of the gospel then in France that the peace conference be opened with some form of divine service for God's guidance was refused on the ground that there was no time available has been frequently mentioned in the Manufacturers' Record. These ministers do not feel authorized to publish the correspondence, but one of the signers, one of the foremost ministers of the country, has briefly stated the facts publicly and has repeatedly in letters to the Manufacturers' Record confirmed his announcement. The large majority of Americans who favor the league of nations do so because they have imagined that it was a religious duty to do so, and that the league would save the world from wars. The other side of the case and the significance of the refusal to hold any divine service is very strikingly presented in the following remarkable article by Eugene Thwing, a widely known author and publicist. Mr. Thwing tears away the claim that the league must be supported on moral or religious grounds or on the ground of saving the world from war, and he leaves not a thread of that garment with which to clothe a creature whose creators definitely refused to recognize the Supreme Creator as the overruling God of all world affairs.—Editor Manufacturers' Record.)

"'When an appeal is made to the American people it is a very dangerous thing for a party to get on the wrong side of a moral issue, and this is a moral issue much more than it is a political issue.' (The New York Times, July 27, 1919.)

"Serious fundamental truth lies in the words quoted above from an editorial in the New York Times urging the league of nations. The American people as a whole prefer righteousness rather than iniquity in its national affairs and in its dealings with other nations. Whatever their religious creed, and even where no religious creed is strictly held, the American people of all sects and all denominations believe at heart that 'righteousness exalteth a nation.' 'In God we trust' is not an empty phrase, and no political party can safely treat it with scorn or defiance.

"The league of nations as now proposed is a moral issue, above all else, and it is necessary for the American people to know why and how.

"I.

"The league of nations is a device of man's contrivance, which was built without recognition of God's governing hand in the affairs of men; it was constructed without any public acknowledgment of Him, and without any public appeal for His guidance.

"During all the sessions of the peace conference in Paris, when the most vital and fundamental issues of world policy were being considered; when the most serious and far-reaching problems of humanity were being discussed, amid bitter disputes and clashing interests; when the delegates of many nations were groping blindly for conclusions which would mean life or death, slavery or freedom, misery or happiness to hundreds of millions of human souls—not once was any appeal made to Almighty God for light and guidance in their counsels. Even the President of our own Christian Nation went away to his self-appointed task without any public acknowledgment of his dependence on God, nor any request to the people of America to seek Divine guidance for him in his mission. No religious service nor public prayer of any kind was allowed in connection with the long, troubled conference. Earnest written petition was presented by Christians outside the conference that there be some invocation of God's blessing and guidance in the work to be done, but official reply was made that there was no time for such service in connection with the conference. Man had serious work to do; there was no time to bother with God!

"And Almighty God turned away from that conference in anger at that moment and set His curse upon it, as of old, in these words: 'Woe to the rebellious children, saith the Lord, that take counsel, but not of me.' (Isaiah 30:1.)

"And in these words: 'Thus saith the Lord: Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord.' (Jeremiah 17:5.)

"And so, having rejected the counsel of the Almighty, these delegates of many nations proceeded to build their own devices, regardless of the warning that—

"'The Lord bringeth the counsel of the nations to nought; He maketh the devices of the people to be of none effect.' (Psalm 33:10.)

"They constructed an edifice of their own contriving, after many bargains and mutual threats and compromises of principles and violations of justice, disbelieving or defying the warning that 'except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it.' And they ornamented their structure with beautiful words, and played before it the music of fine-sounding ideals, making it 'indeed appear beautiful outward,' while within it was 'full of dead man's bones and of all uncleanness.' And they called their edifice 'the league of nations,' dedicated to the 'peace of the world.'

"And, having ears, they heard not the awful sound which came from the Eternal Throne:

"'He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision. Then shall He speak unto them in His wrath and vex them in His sore displeasure.' (Psalm 2:4–5.)

"II.

"The league of nations is in direct disobedience to the commands of God as given many centuries ago to His people when He delivered them from their oppressors and delivered into the hands of His people those enemies of His who had defied Him and worked abominations in His sight.

"'When the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee, then shalt thou smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them nor show mercy to them.

"'Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son.

"'For they will turn away thy son from following Me, that they may serve other gods; so will the anger of the Lord be kindled against you.' (Deuteronomy 7:2-4.)

"The 'utterly destroy' in the first part of this command, evidently, in the light of what follows, does not mean slaughter nor utter destruction of property, but complete destruction of power, and complete refusal of political and family alliances. The command is repeated many times, in various forms, emphasizing the need of separation between the nations whose God is the Lord and the nations who will have none of Him. In the new dispensation the command was made even more explicit:

"'Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? And what communion hath light with darkness?' (II Cor., 6:14.)

"Among the 32 members of the league of nations are many pagan nations. Their presence in the Paris peace conference was one of the things, no doubt, which prevented the recognition of God and a turning to Him for guidance. The United States, a Christian Nation, with only 1 vote in a total of 32, would certainly be 'unequally yoked together with unbelievers' in disobedience of the command of God. The offense would be increased when Germany, that great worker of abominations, is admitted as a member of the league of nations and a subscriber to and beneficiary of the 'covenant.' No good could come of this unequal yoking together, but only evil, as only evil has come during the first period of that yoke fellowship. The wish and the vote of the United States has been set at naught already by the wish and the vote of pagans. It would be so again and again.

"All this unequal yoking together has been covered up with finely spun sentiment and unfulfillable promises; but God's people are warned against this very thing.

"'Let no man deceive you with vain words, for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. Be not ye therefore partakers with them, and have no fellowship with the unfaithful works of darkness.' (Eph. 5:6, 7, 11.)

"III.

"The league of nations is an instrument of evil and not an instrument of good.

"It could not be otherwise, since, in its making, the guidance of the God of Nations was not sought and recognition of Him was refused. It could not be otherwise, since it yields to, even if it is not dominated by, pagan influences.

"Its promises have been for justice, and its first definite acts have been acts of injustice. Thus already the world has been 'deceived with vain words.'

"In the concrete example of Shantung, the league of nations pledges itself to 'respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league,' and following that pledge it appends the name of China as one of its members to whom the pledge is made. Then, after formulating, and agreeing to, and proudly proclaiming to the world and to China this beneficent purpose of the league, the very men who made the league and the pledge proceeded to tear away from China, one of its own chosen members, a large part of its most important territory and 38,000,000 of its citizens, with the vast interests pertaining to them, and to turn them all over to an external aggressor who demanded them, in order to bribe that pagan aggressor to become also a member of that same league and to subscribe to that same pledge!

"Can any more grotesque or preposterous act of injustice and insincerity be imagined? The sponsors of the league of nations, solemnly agreeing to protect one another against any despoiler, deliberately compound with such a despoiler, the complete violation of their own most sacred pledge and rob one of their own weaker members at the command of the despoiler, in order that this very despoiler may be induced to come into the league and join in the pledge to 'respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of all members!'

"What respect can the creators of the league have for their own pledge after so gross a violation in the very act of making it? What respect will that nation have for it that violated it as a condition to becoming a party to it? Even at the very beginning of his strange contrivance of men who refused to seek the blessing and guidance of Almighty God on their work, He was making 'the devices of the people to be of none effect.'

"Our own President yielded to this act of gross injustice against and despoliation of a friend. He acknowledges that he disapproved and tried to modify it, but felt compelled to consent to the wrong in order to get Japan into the league of nations. What a pity he did not have this warning blazoned in letters of fire before his eyes, 'When sinners entice thee, consent thou not!'

"The time to remember that the league of nations 'is a moral issue' was just then, when temptations to do wrong for seeming political advantage assailed the makers of the league. The very soul of the league was bartered away at the moment of its birth in order that it might have the appearance of power. And in gaining this appearance of power it showed that it possessed the very essence of weakness and failure.

"Whatever the temptations, whatever the threatenings, whatever the troublesome alternative, one simple rule, one final test, would have settled everything with honor and integrity and established the league of nations upon a solid rock. It is the rule followed by and emphasized by Theodore Roosevelt, 'The choice must ever be in favor of righteousness, and this whether the alternative be peace or whether the alternative be war. The question must not be merely, Is it to be peace or war? The question must be, Is the right to prevail? Are the great laws of righteousness to be fulfilled? And the answer from a strong, virile people must be "yes," whatever the cost. We scorn the man who would not stand for justice though the whole world come in arms against him.'

"Only as he is girded and guided by the God of righteousness can any man be strong enough and wise enough to stand thus at such a time. Only then can he translate into his words and acts of the twentieth century, as Roosevelt did, the proud confidence of King David of 30 centuries ago:

"'The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?

"'When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell.

"'Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should arise against me, in this will I be confident.'

"IV.

"The league of nations is foredoomed to utter failure because of its disobedience to God and its own inherent weakness.

"Many times, through the centuries, nations have tried similar plans, and all have failed. Again and again God rebuked and punished Israel and Judah for seeking to strengthen themselves with pagan alliances instead of with obedience to Him. And more modern history contains instances of leagues of nations, notably the one that was formed at Aix-le-Chapelle just a hundred years before the present peace conference met in Paris. The same idealistic pronouncements then, as now, 'seemed to promise the advent of the golden age.' But then, also, the league, formed 'as a sign of brotherly good will,' was merely a smiling mask behind which the great powers continued their own alliances 'by a secret protocol,' and the scheme came to naught.

"The inherent weakness of this new league of nations makes its failure certain, if even its actual career shall begin. This weakness lies in—

"1. Its composition politically, its membership of jealous, rival nations, their historical enmities, their geographical jealousies, their racial and religious hostilities, their trade rivalries and jealousies.

"2. Its composition morally, without God as the accepted Leader, and righteousness as the governing principle; with bitter hatred in many hearts. 'Everyone, from the least even unto the greatest, is given to covetousness—everyone dealeth falsely,' and 'inwardly they are ravening wolves.' Even if this is not true of some of the best, it is true undeniably of others, and no league containing such elements can be for long a federation of peace able to 'substitute the court of law for the arbitrament of war.'

"3. Its certainty of disagreement and split. No vital question of magnitude can be decided to the satisfaction of all. No strong nation will allow the others to vote against it with impunity. (Would we?) Secret intrigues and realignments already are going on. Expulsion or withdrawal of any strong nation is sure to result in a stupendous war.

"4. Its wrong basis of power. If any power at all exists, it is the power of strong nations, for the moment acting together, to enforce their will upon weak nations. They can not enforce their will upon one of their own number. They have already failed to do anything more than buy one another's consent by the giving of the property of the weak in return for consent. And this is weakness, not power. Certainly no moral power has been asked for nor conferred upon the league by the God from whom it has turned away.

"5. Its inconsistency and insincerity. It plans for disarmament while all its members feverishly increase their armaments, some members being particularly active in that respect. Claims are made in behalf of the league which are far from true. Its founders and advocates profess principles to govern its operation which they discard in its formation. It is urged as a means to world peace, but it contains the threat of innumerable wars. It is offered as a protector of weak nations against strong aggressors, and it begins by helping the strong aggressor to ravish its weaker neighbor. Therefore, 'be not deceived, God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man (or a nation) soweth, that shall he also reap.'

"The whole scheme of the Godless league is summed up in I Thessalonians, 5:3: 'When they shall say, "peace and safety," then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape.' This was true in 1914; it is true in 1919. The new forces of 'sudden destruction' are in preparation at this very moment, some of them in the plain sight of men and some of them hidden away in the dark. Some of the preparers are in the league, and some are without, scheming to get in, so that they may carry on their preparations more expeditiously and effectively.

"The superficiality and futility of the whole glib and glittering program, with all its ceremony and theatrical display, is expressed in the sad lament of the Prophet Jeremiah: 'They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, peace, peace, when there is no peace.'

"The league of nations is only a splendid appearing structure, with no real living soul to hold its form together. It is an offense to the living God. It will crumble and disappear when the shouting and the tumult die. God keep America out of it! God turn the hearts of Americans to seek His guidance and accept His leadership!

"'The counsel of the Lord standeth forever. Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord.'"

RAILROAD PASSES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I next offer a communication from Life, a source of perennial philosophy, a wellspring of humorous instruction to guide us when we laugh and free us from our nonsense with a smile. It is a profound observation on the railway deficit. I ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It notes that among those to whom free passes have been issued by the Railway Administration are included 33 widows and 4 mothers-in-law. I ask that the whole article, which is a very short one, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"INFORMATION.

"To those who think that our railroad rates are too high, and that the whole system is more or less corrupt and incompetent, it will be good news to learn that not everybody is suffering from this high cost of travel. There are certain exceptions.

"According to the Hines report on July 1, 1919, there are 1,590 wives, daughters, sons, and relatives of the United States railroad officials who hold annual all-line railroad passes. Of these, 1,096 hold annual all-line Pullman passes. The ladies have by no means been neglected. Among them are 33 widows and 4 mothers-in-law.

"If you wish to travel free over our Government-controlled railroad system, the proper way is to get some relative a job as a United States railroad official."

GOVERNMENT-CONTROLLED RAILROADS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in this connection I offer and ask to have read a very short letter from one of my constituents in southern Colorado, which I think contains some valuable information, which, however, is not entirely new.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

TRINCHERA, COLO., September 18, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senator from Colorado.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you a private letter in regard to our railroad situation here. It is claimed there is a great shortage of labor, but it is not necessary the Government-controlled railroads have at least five times as many track workers as they formerly had.

Had the corporations used the same unbusiness-like methods it would have created just such a condition 10 years ago; perhaps the deficit would not have been quite so great as it is now.

I am a farmer here, but am unable to employ sufficient help to harvest and replant my crop without paying an unreasonable price for such help. I think the labor unions are in control of our Government.

We never had such poor service from the railroads, never was treated more contemptuously by its agents, and never paid so much money to be abused as we are paying under Government control. If those people want to strike let them do so.

Very truly, yours,

O. D. HOLLENBECK.

ENFORCEMENT OF ORDER—DECORUM IN THE GALLERIES.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina submits a resolution and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 192), as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that in the interest of decorum and good order the presiding officer shall enforce section 6 of Rule XIX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it would be very much out of place for the Senate to pass a resolution calling upon its presiding officer to enforce the rules of the body. I think it would be unwise to do so.

Mr. McLEAN. I object to the consideration of the resolution. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say before the Senator from Connecticut insists on his objection that there is no intention on my part of making any reflection upon the present occupant of the chair or the Vice President, but the resolution merely follows out a suggestion from the Vice President himself that he would like to know the sense of the Senate in regard to this matter, whether or not the rule should be enforced. The rule has not been enforced until the Senate has really taken on the aspects of a mob or a town meeting. I saw on yesterday a Senator of the United States, while standing upon the floor and inviting the Chair to enforce the rule, being hissed outrageously by the galleries. It is a shame. For the first time in the history of the Senate the galleries cheer and hiss while a colloquy between two Senators on the floor is taking place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair desires to say that he very much needs the moral support of Senators if the rule is to be enforced. It is practically impossible to do so unless Senators express their desire to have it done.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I was going to say to the Senate that the present occupant of the chair was right in what he said on yesterday, and the presentation of this resolution is intended as no reflection on any presiding officer; but I repeat the Vice President of the United States himself has invited the Senate to give an expression of its opinion in reference to the enforcement of the rule. I also know that the present occupant of the chair desires an expression from the Senate as to whether or not he should enforce the rule. The enforcement of the rule is always left to the sound judgment of the presiding officer. When a Senator makes a great speech in the Senate, whether or not the galleries should be permitted to cheer is one question, but that the galleries should cheer while two Senators are engaged in a colloquy upon the floor of the Senate is outrageous. If such demonstrations continue, we may have fights in the galleries, and the Senate may degenerate into a mob. Where is it going to lead?

Mr. President, recall in your own mind the presiding officers of this Chamber who have heretofore occupied that high position, such as the lamented Sherman, and Fairbanks, and that greatest of all presiding officers I have ever seen, William P. Frye—the gallaries would never have thought of doing such a thing in the days of those great presiding officers. I think in the interest of dignity and decorum the rule ought to be enforced.

I repeat that no reflection is intended on the present presiding officer, who himself has stated that he should like to know what the opinion of the Senate is in regard to the enforcement of the rule. I think I know what is the opinion of a majority of Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina a question

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield gladly to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Without undertaking to contend that the Senator is in any way wrong, I should like to ask him how the presiding officer could enforce the rule in such cases? Take yesterday, for instance, what would have been the duty of the presiding officer on that occasion?

Mr. OVERMAN. If the presiding officer should clear the galleries but once, that would end these disorderly manifestations.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator another question. In the case of applause such as we had yesterday, for instance, and as we have had on other days, would the Senator from North Carolina have the presiding officer order the galleries cleared?

Mr. OVERMAN. I would, if the occupants of the galleries should cheer and hiss a Senator as they did on yesterday.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that we desire to pursue the course—I am not saying that I would not desire that it be done—of carrying out the Senator's idea in that manner, we would thereby prevent hundreds of people from occupying seats in the galleries who are not at all guilty of violating the rules. Not all of the people in the galleries cheer or hiss.

Mr. OVERMAN. Since I have been a Member of the Senate I have seen the galleries cleared, and it had a splendid effect.

Mr. NORRIS. If there could be a method of ejecting from the galleries those who were guilty of a violation of the rule and at the same time not interfere with other occupants of the gallery it would be a solution of the difficulty; but I do not know how that could be accomplished.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not myself know how that could be done. The only way to do is, as I have seen done heretofore, to have the galleries temporarily cleared. That has the moral effect which goes with enforcing and carrying out the rules of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator must admit that that would be punishing the innocent as well as the guilty.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is sometimes necessary to do that. The innocent have to suffer as well as the guilty in such cases.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to remind the Senator from Nebraska that the people in the galleries are the guests of the Senate, and it is no punishment for them to be deprived of seats in the gallery for half an hour, if need be, in order to enforce discipline.

I desire also to remind the Senator that while the House of Representatives is very liberal and permits applause upon the part of Members upon the floor, the Senator from Nebraska in his long service there never heard and I never heard applause permitted from the galleries.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator never heard the galleries in the House applaud?

Mr. LENROOT. I have seen them start to applaud, as the Senator has, but the Speaker has immediately prevented it under threat of clearing the galleries.

Mr. NORRIS. Why, Mr. President, I do not know that it would be a precedent here, but I have seen the galleries in the House applaud until it would make the applause that we have heard in the Senate "look like 30 cents." I am not objecting to some action if a proper rule can be secured; I am only calling attention to the fact that if the rule were enforced it would enable one person, if he desired to do so, to go into the gallery and applaud and make everybody else go out.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. We are proposing to punish the innocent as well as the guilty. I never saw an instance when all the occupants of galleries were guilty.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is left to the sound discretion of the presiding officer. When he knows the Senate is standing back of him and going to help him to enforce the rule he can keep order. I have seen the galleries cleared once or twice when they paid no attention to the admonitions of the presiding officer. There is no reason why a presiding officer should clear the galleries if there is cheering after a great speech is delivered, but recall what took place in the Senate yesterday; the galleries were a mob. The Senator does not want to have hisses from the gallery.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. He does not want to see his colleagues hissed?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I admit that.

Mr. OVERMAN. He does not want to see cheering going on in the galleries and loud noises made?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest to the Senator that, in order not to discriminate against those who are obeying the rules of the Senate, if we find ourselves unable to have the rule enforced, we ought, it seems to me, to employ a few more doorkeepers, distribute them through the galleries and eject from the galleries, for instance, those who hiss.

Mr. OVERMAN. The presiding officer can do that now.

Mr. NORRIS. The presiding officer can not do that now. He can not point out the person who hisses.

Mr. OVERMAN. He can order the doorkeepers in the visitors' galleries to do so. It is a question with him how he shall do it.

Mr. NORRIS. He himself says he does not know how he should do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. And the Senator says he does not know how he would do it.

Mr. NORRIS. I have made my suggestion.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senator thinks it ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from North Carolina hear a suggestion from the Chair?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The difficulty under which the presiding officer labored yesterday lies in the somewhat indefinite language of the rule. The rule provides:

> Whenever confusion arises in the Chamber or the galleries, or demonstrations of approval or disapproval are indulged in by the occupants of the galleries, it shall be the duty of the Chair to enforce order on his own initiative and without any point of order being made by a Senator.

It does not provide that the galleries shall be cleared or that the doors shall be closed; and the present occupant of the chair would have great difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the galleries of the Senate should be closed to the public because a violation of the rule occurred in the galleries.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is just as I have said; it is left to the presiding officer how we will enforce the rule. Heretofore it has been enforced by the presiding officer, and we have had no trouble. If the galleries choose to cheer after a great speech is made, everybody recognizes the fact that that is all right; but when they get turbulent, as has been the case recently, the presiding officer can enforce the rule as he pleases and as it has been enforced in the past by Mr. Sherman and by Mr. Frye, as the Senator recollects. The presiding officer must use his own judgment.

The Vice President has stated that if the Senate would stand back of him he could enforce the rule and have order, and he invited an expression of the sentiment of the Senate. The present presiding officer himself said—and I intend no reflection on him—that he desired to know the sense of the Senate; and all I am trying to do is to get an expression of the sense of the Senate whether the rule ought to be enforced by the presiding officer in such manner as he thinks will keep order; that is all.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I was struck the other day when the Vice President said he was going to put this matter squarely up to the Committee on Rules. That was his language. Occupying the position of chairman of that committee, I have been thinking over what the Committee on Rules could do. Suppose the Vice President did put it up to the committee. We do not make the rules of the Senate; we are not an executive branch of the Senate's authority. The rules are made by the Senate, and the duty of enforcing the rules rests upon the Vice President or upon whoever occupies the chair. We can not suspend the rules by advising him not to enforce the rule; it takes the Senate to do that; the Senate will have to modify the rule.

It seems to me, Mr. President, the Senate has got this matter very much in its own hands. We all know that, whatever the rule is, it will occasionally be broken. It is a rule which, I think, ought to be enforced in moderation. When there is an abuse of the rule the Senate has the remedy in its own hands by a motion to go into executive session, which automatically closes the galleries, and then proceed as in legislative session behind closed doors. In that way the remedy can be applied whenever the mischief reaches a point where it ought to be severely corrected. If we had a hundred rules, I do not believe, under extraordinary circumstances and in great crises such as we are passing through now, and passed through during the war, that we can prevent moderate expressions of approval, and sometimes of disapproval, on the part of occupants of the galleries.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator. We can not make a rule such as he says the Vice President invited; but the Vice President said that if the Senate would stand back of him the present rule was sufficient. Now, the moral effect of the Senate expressing itself upon this rule will, I have no doubt, be what the Vice President would like to have—an expression as to whether he should enforce it. I think it is his duty to do it; but, owing to what has been said upon this floor, the rules have not been enforced. The Senator admits that; the occupant of the chair admits it; and simply an expression from the Senate to the public that the Vice President or the occupant of the chair should enforce this rule would have a very sound and healthy effect. The Senate can do as it pleases about it, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I thought the position taken by the Vice President was a very sensible one. He gave notice to the Senate that he was going to enforce section 6 of Rule XIX, and that if the Senate wanted it otherwise than what he gave notice he intended to do, they should change the rules of the body.

Mr. President, I think that is the sensible thing to do. This resolution which is presented states that it is the sense of the Senate that in the interest of decorum and good order the presiding officer shall enforce section 6 of Rule XIX. The presiding officer knows what the rules of the body are to-day, and the matter is entirely in his hands. I think the Vice President was right when he stated that unless the Senate wanted this rule enforced they had better change the rules, because hereafter he intended to enforce them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my service in the Senate has been a comparatively brief one, but during that time I can recall only one instance in which the rule was actually enforced. The order has been given on several occasions by the presiding officer, but has been met with a storm of protest from the occupants of the floor, the usual basis of the protest being that the applause or the violation of the rule began upon the floor rather than in the galleries.

My concern regarding this subject has to do with the existence of a rule which is chiefly honored by the breach. Nothing brings a law—whether it be a rule of a deliberative body or a statute—into disrepute so certainly and so quickly as a disregard of its provisions, especially if it be a prohibitory one. Hence, if this rule is not to be enforced it is better that it be deliberately repealed. Then there will be nothing that the occupants of the galleries can do, short of riotous demonstrations or throwing rotten eggs—as the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] suggests—which would not be within the purview of decorum, so far as general conditions are concerned.

Mr. President, I do not object to demonstrations from the galleries, even in this body, which claims to be—whether it is or not—the greatest deliberative body in the world; but I am convinced that such infractions of the rule as we have observed during the past three or four weeks will, if permitted to go on unchallenged and unabated, lead to far more serious conditions and may interfere with the due exercise of our duties upon this floor as representatives of the States and the people.

A Senator yesterday who rose to protest against an undue demonstration was hissed from the galleries. A few days ago the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], rising to reply to some remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], was hissed from the galleries. That is not a very pleasant demonstration for a man to encounter either in or out of the Senate; and if such manifestations are permitted one can readily imagine that they will be amplified by other and more robust expressions of disapproval.

The history of the French Assembly is somewhat illuminating upon this subject. There the galleries began by demonstrations of approval and ended by dictating the action of the assembly. I can readily imagine how, if the purpose is, as it may ultimately grow to be, to influence senatorial action from the galleries, that they will be occupied by individuals intent upon that purpose, and will manifest their requirements in no uncertain way, and may not always content themselves by merely interrupting the proceedings with disorderly remarks or other noisy expressions of disapprobation.

I hope that the rule will be reasonably enforced, and I hope that our guests in the galleries will appreciate the importance of conforming to those requirements and conditions which we impose, for their own benefit and ours, upon them as guests of the Senate. I do not want to see a repetition of such conduct as we witnessed yesterday. Perhaps the best thing to have done in the circumstances was done by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who promptly moved that the Senate adjourn; but the conduct to which I refer is discreditable and wrong, and I think the rebuke of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] yesterday was timely and was justified.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator said he did not object to a reasonable amount of discretion being allowed the Chair. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that it would be more onerous on the presiding officer than it is at present to determine just what should be allowed and what should not be allowed? Would it not be better to have a rule, and enforce it strictly, that no demonstration whatever from the galleries, either of approbation or of disapprobation, should be permitted? It is one of those difficulties that we find in all legislation—trying to take care of exceptions. You have to have a rule, and obey the rule strictly, without regard to what exceptions may arise.

Mr. THOMAS. I have already said that I think the rule should either be enforced or it should be repealed. What I meant by a reasonable relaxation of its requirements can perhaps be illustrated by many incidents with which the Senator is familiar and which occurred prior to the more recent and more noisy manifestations.

Now, I do not want to pose here as a Pharisee. I have started two applauses upon this floor myself.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator should not have done it.

Mr. THOMAS. I know I should not have done it, but I did it involuntarily; and I can understand how, in the enthusiasm of a given moment, the occupants of the galleries may act similarly. One of them occurred when my friend the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] cast his vote for the Underwood bill. I was sitting over here, and his action was so pleasing to me that before I knew it I was clapping my hands; and I may add that I was called down for it very thoroughly and very vigorously by the late lamented Senator from Georgia, Mr. Bacon, who, in the cloakroom, told me in no uncertain tones what he thought of my conduct, and how grossly I had offended the dignity and propriety of the United States Senate.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator need not make it. I will yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state his point of order.

Mr. McLEAN. I dislike very much to abbreviate the remarks of the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. THOMAS. I was through, anyway.

Mr. McLEAN. But I objected to the consideration of this resolution this morning, and I understand that it goes over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The Chair understands that the Senator from Connecticut objected to the present consideration of the resolution, and it goes over until to-morrow. The morning business is closed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7478, Order of Business 126.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. KENYON. On yesterday I introduced a resolution which went over under the rule. I ask if that is given any preference?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the ruling of the Vice President, as the Chair understands it, such resolutions are to be called up by Senators and are not automatically laid before the Senate. If, however, the Senator desires to call up the resolution it is his privilege to do so, and it will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. Another parliamentary inquiry. In view of the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], would a resolution coming over from yesterday have any parliamentary precedence of that motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution which is first called up will be the resolution first laid before the Senate.

Mr. McLEAN. Will that take precedence of my motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Connecticut state his motion again?

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7478.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Chair rules——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that a suggestion to call up a resolution that went over under the rule yesterday takes precedence of a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill on the calendar.

STRIKE OF STEEL MILLS EMPLOYEES.

Mr. KENYON. I ask, then, to take up Senate resolution 188, which went over yesterday under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 188, introduced by Mr. KENYON on the 22d instant, as follows:

Whereas a strike of the employees of the steel mills of the United States has been called; and

Whereas such strike adds to the troublesome conditions already existing and becoming a question of great public moment; and

Whereas it is the duty of Congress to investigate the causes and purposes of said strike and see if the situation can in any way be relieved by Federal action: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor of the United States Senate is hereby instructed to immediately investigate said strike and report to the Senate within the shortest possible time the causes and reason therefor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to say just a word. I do not introduce the resolution in behalf of either side of this controversy. I introduce the resolution because of the great third party to every strike, the party that is not represented, and that is the public. This strike seems to be the commencement of trouble. Industry is in rather a ticklish situation in the country and it needs every kind of steadying force. With these facts before the people, as there are now nearly 300,000 men on strike in an industry that reaches into every part of our industrial life and touches every family in the country, it seems to me that the Congress can not sit idly by and do nothing whatever in the matter.

Certain demands have been made by the union, apparently, according to the newspapers. Congress is not familiar with what those demands are on the part of the strikers. Certain positions have been taken by the employers. One is that the strike is really caused by aliens. That is a matter we ought to know about, for it is a very important matter. The whole situation will be helped by the publicity that an investigation by the Senate will give to it.

I know there is a general feeling—and I share in it, too—that such investigations do not amount to very much; but I remember full well when the Paint Creek and the Cabin Creek strike was taking place in West Virginia. A great deal of property had been destroyed before Congress acted. Many people were killed. It was veritably a civil war in West Virginia. A committee was appointed by the Senate that went to West Virginia, under the chairmanship of the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and I shall always feel that his work as chairman of that committee had much to do with quieting that situation. The strike was stopped, property was saved, lives were saved, and there has not been a strike in that region since. I pay tribute to the Senator from Virginia for the way he handled that matter.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that these men who are striking, who are the leaders of the strike, can be brought before a Senate committee, and it can find out what is the matter; and the owners of the property likewise can be brought before the Senate committee, and it can find out what is the matter. The day has gone by, I believe, in this country when either capital or labor has the right to precipitate upon the country conditions that are destructive of our industrial life. It is the purpose of my resolution to have a representative of the great third party to these strikes, the people of the United States.

We have no War Labor Board now. That is, it is not functioning and can not act. I do not know just the condition of the Mediation and Conciliation Board in the Department of Labor. Out of this may come some legislation, with larger powers of conciliation and mediation. I do not mean by that compulsory arbitration. I do not believe that can come in this country. But the point I am making is that this great strike seems to be the first skirmish in an industrial warfare in this country, and we may as well face it. There is no use putting our heads in the sand, ostrich like, and saying it does not amount to anything. It does. Let us face it, find out the facts, give it all publicity, and see if there is anything the American Congress can do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. When the facts are determined, does he contemplate that the Congress then should attempt to remedy the condition by any legislation?

Mr. KENYON. If the Congress can. I do not know until we know the facts. I think the Senator must be rather disturbed, and as I think we all must be, about industrial conditions in this country. We at least ought to know the facts, and then determine whether we can do anything.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am greatly disturbed at the tendency that seems to be prevalent throughout the country, that the Congress of the United States shall be the place where the relations in the great industrial world are to be determined. I think the common sense of the people at large in their own private affairs should be tested out to the very last before we begin what in my mind seems to be a tendency toward socialism.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator think an investigation of a great strike that enters into all our industrial relationships is socialism?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If we are looking toward legislation that is to regulate all our industrial affairs. It seems to me that the causes are now more or less known. They have not been kept secret. The public are very well advised as to what are the causes.

Mr. KENYON. Is the Senator advised as to the causes of the strike?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think they have been very assiduously published. If there is any other matter inside, while, as a matter of course, the public are vitally interested when it touches the great industries upon which we are all dependent, it seems to me that it is a case where it would be better to suffer some ill and preserve our Government as it is, and let such disease work themselves out as between man and man, rather than attempt to cure them by a worse disease.

Mr. KENYON. I am simply seeking for the facts. I have no remedy to offer as yet.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Iowa, and if he will allow me I will precede my inquiry by a word.

I am not ordinarily in favor of miscellaneous investigations, and where conditions are as they have been suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, I think it is just as well, if they are localized and are definite and specific, to let them work themselves out. But it seems to me if what we see in the press is true there are issues upon which a development of facts in this case bears that are much broader than mere remedial legislation which might be passed to regulate strikes. I read in this morning's paper that in certain of the larger and older and better established mills in the city of Pittsburgh and in its vicinity, where now practically 100 per cent of American labor is employed, there is no strike. I saw it also stated that the principal difficulty was with the Slavs and other foreigners, for whom we have been pouring out blood and treasure in the last year and a half. I do not vouch for the truth of these statements, but suppose it is true that the Americans want to work and that the foreigners, for whom we have done so much and for whom we are being asked to do so much more, are striking. Why should we not ascertain the fact as a basis for a policy that the Government should pursue?

Mr. KENYON. I do not know that the Senator heard me. I suggested that that complaint had been made.

Mr. KNOX. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. And I said the facts we ought to know, and that is one of the reasons why I have been stimulated to introduce the resolution. Certainly knowing all the facts in the matter on both sides of the controversy can not do any harm and may result in good. I have nothing more to say on this question. Action, not words, is now needed.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I feel a very warm sympathy for the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to examine into this matter. There are more things involved in this particular controversy by far than either the capital or the labor. All those who use steel products are face to face with a denial of those things which are essential and necessary in their lines of industry. The whole of the American people are concerned in this controversy, and there are direct conflicts of statement made with regard to the merits of the controversy itself. I think the United States Government may very properly, on behalf of the people of the United States, make an inquiry into it and ascertain what the truth is, so that a national policy may be based upon what may be found to be the truth in this very serious and widely extended matter. It goes into many States. It affects the whole country. I am altogether in favor of the resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have not the resolution of the Senator from Iowa before me, and I ask him whether there is a provision in it for sitting in other places than the District of Columbia, and for the expenditure of the necessary money?

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that the resolution does not provide for the committee to sit outside of the District of Columbia, because it is perfectly apparent that Senators could not leave the city now. The idea was to bring a number of men here before the committee. I think it would not involve any expense, and if it does I shall ask for the adoption of a further resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand the Senator from Iowa asks for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KENYON. I do. It went over yesterday under the rule, and I think immediate consideration should be had.

Mr. THOMAS. I introduced a resolution relating to the same subject this morning. I am not prepared to discuss it at present. Personally I have no particular objection to the investigation, but I am not at all confident that it will result in any substantial advantage. We are given to investigating in the Senate very nearly everything now that occurs out of the usual order of things. If a controversy of this sort, extending, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] says, over a number of States, is to be investigated it will take the rest of the time of the Sixty-sixth Congress. I have no doubt all the time of the committee will be occupied, and by the time its labors are through the strike will be over one way or the other, and we will have our trouble and expense for our pains.

I do not pretend, Mr. President, to be a judge of the causes of this strike, beyond the fact that it was announced, if the papers are reliable, a number of months ago that a war—I think that was the term used—or a contest for the unionization of the United States Steel Co.'s shops was determined upon, and would be prosecuted accordingly. I also know, from the publications of Sunday morning, that among other things the alleged cause of the strike is the refusal by Mr. Gary to confer with the heads of certain organizations, a refusal which I think was unwise and unjustified, because nothing can ever result injuriously from a conference over any matter which people who differ want to consider, and consider mutually.

I realize the gravity of this strike, I think, as keenly as any man in the United States, and I am not only troubled about it, but I apprehend that it is one of those constantly developing conditions which will put the institutions of the United States to their supreme test unless some changes occur within the near future, and it was because I have been so depressed with the gravity of the situation that I felt justified in announcing that I would say something about it to-morrow.

I shall not oppose this resolution. I merely wish to warn the Senate that it means a large expenditure and no substantial result will flow from it. The situation is too critical to admit of an extended investigation, because the investigation would last longer than the strike. However, if the Senate is of a different opinion, I shall yield very readily to its view.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, no man can tell, I believe, now just what the result of this investigation will be, but I believe all will agree that there is disagreement now in the country as to just what is at issue in this strike. There always is in a strike of this magnitude.

The resolution of investigation does not propose any remedy. It may be that the investigation will develop the desirability of some remedy or some legislation, and it may be it will not. It will at least do two things, in my judgment—it will place before the country an authoritative statement as to just what the issue is in the controversy, and, second, it will give publicity to the facts that are involved.

After all, Mr. President, a fair, honest statement of the controversy, given publicity from a source in which the people had confidence, would probably do more to cure the evil, whatever it may be found to be, than would legislation.

It may develop, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has suggested, that some expense will be necessary. Under the resolution as it now stands the committee can not go to any expense. It may be that when they investigate they will find it necessary to spend some money and go out from Washington to get some of the facts. If they do, they can come back to the Senate and place the matter before the Senate, and the Senate can act on the question as to whether there shall be any money expended in a further investigation. It will be necessary for the committee to do that before it can expend public funds.

But, Mr. President, if the resolution is passed as it now stands, this investigation will come under the supervision of the committee named, of which the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is chairman, and not only everybody in the Senate but everybody in the country knows that a determination of the facts by a committee headed by that Senator will be received by all honest-thinking men as true. It will have the confidence and the respect not only of this body but of the country at large. That kind of an investigation, made judicially and fairly, with a view of getting the truth and sifting out the error and the wrong, in my judgment, will do a great deal of good. If the employers are coercing the employees, or if the employees are demanding something that is not right or fair, I think this investigation will disclose the truth and will throw the light of publicity upon it, and around and behind that kind of a finding there will be the public sentiment of the country, which, after all, in the last analysis, is stronger than any law that can be passed.

There is a condition confronting the country that may bring evil. This strike, reaching into every State, into every community, or, I might say, into ever home, is bearing upon a product that we all use in all lines of business. The manufacturer in his millionaire plant and the farmer between the plow handles are affected by it. Everybody has an interest in it. If there is an honest way by which it can be avoided or the evil effect of it diminished by giving to the country publicity as to the real facts, the Senate ought not to hesitate to do it. It is different from some local affair. It is a national thing, Mr. President. As I said, the entire country is interested in it. It may not be necessary to do anything further than to give publicity to the truth, first finding out what the truth is. The people of the country ought to know that. It seems to me they are entitled to know it.

If there were any other tribunal that could do the work better or as well, I would not have any hesitancy to let that tribunal take it in charge. It may be the investigation could be conducted by some existing commission or body that exists as a matter of law. If that can be suggested, all well and good. Personally I do not know of any other instrumentality that is better equipped to do this particular work than is the committee named in the resolution.

Of course, it may be that the strike can not be stopped. If it can not, even if it goes on to the limit, the people of the country ought to know what the truth is in regard to it. They ought to know the claims of both sides and why those claims are made, so that every intelligent man for himself will be able to analyze and see where the evil is.

It may not be that any law on this particular subject will result from this resolution, but the information gained, as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], may be valuable even in a law that might propose to change our immigration law. There are a hundred things that might develop. I do not know that they will. I do not profess to know what the truth is. I only see the claims that we all see in the newspapers, and they do not agree. I do not know who is right. It may be that both sides are partially wrong. It may be that there is some evil which publicity will cure. It seems to me that we can not better perform a duty to the entire country, to all classes of our people, than to set this committee to work.

I have felt so much that this subject ought to be taken up that while, as between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and myself, I probably would have had the right of way under a resolution that I was going to take up yesterday and that went over until to-day, I was very glad to put it over again in order to take up this resolution and have it disposed of at once. The time is now. The investigation ought to begin to-day. There ought to be no delay. It seems to me when we have a question in which all the people of our country are so vitally interested, and which may bring such dire results, which may mean evil, the time to commence work is now, and I believe this is the committee that ought to commence it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by act of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate by illness. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Eighty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum of the Senate present.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Ohio if he is willing to withdraw his amendment while I offer two or three formal amendments to correct the phraseology of the bill?

Mr. POMERENE. Before that is done I desire to say that I think the Senate has not as yet agreed to take up this bill.

Mr. McLEAN. I thought the Senate had already done so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7478.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this bill is not properly before the Senate and is improperly upon the Senate Calendar, because it has never been acted upon by the committee to which it was referred. I make the point of order upon the statements made by various members of the committee the other day when the bill was up for consideration. I would not ordinarily make such a point of order, because upon bills of local importance it is a common practice to poll members of the committee without a formal meeting of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present temporary occupant of the chair has never before had occasion to pass upon this identical question, and will therefore ask the Senator from Wisconsin to be so kind as to point the Chair to the rule under which he makes the point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. The Chair will find it on page 257 of Jefferson's Manual. There is no specific rule upon the question, for it is so elementary that it has not been contemplated that it would ever be necessary to incorporate it as a part of the rules. I will read the clause from Jefferson's Manual:

> A committee meet when and where they please, if the House has not ordered time and place for them, but they can only act when together, and not by separate consultation and consent—nothing being the report of the committee but what has been agreed to in committee actually assembled.

It was repeatedly stated upon the floor the other day that what had been done with regard to this bill was to take a poll of the committee; that there had never been any formal action upon the bill by the committee. Of course, if I am mistaken in that, my point of order does not lie. I make the point of order solely upon the strength of the statements which were made by various members of the committee the other day. If it be true that the bill was reported upon a poll of the members of the committee and that the committee never took any formal action—and I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is no printed report on the bill—if that be true, of course the bill is not before the Senate at all.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, in the first place, the Senator from Wisconsin is mistaken in regard to there not being a printed report on the bill. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] reported the bill and filed with it a printed report, which is on the calendar.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not question that, but it does not happen to be upon my calendar.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not understand that the rule from Jefferson's Manual which the Senator from Wisconsin has read has ever before been applied to the procedure of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. It has been applied since I have been a Member of this body, which has only been a year and a half.

Mr. McLEAN. I have been here nearly nine years, and I do not remember of its ever having been invoked. Of course, every Senator knows that the polling of committees is a custom which is frequently followed. I was absent from the city at the time the bill was reported, but I understand from the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], who is not in the Chamber at present, that a majority of the committee signed or approved the report, and I think that is the fact. If that is not a proper proceeding, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Committee on Banking and Currency held a meeting last Saturday with regard to this bill, at which the bill was discussed, and while a majority of the committee were not present, I do not understand that the fact that a majority of the committee approve this bill is questioned by any Senator.

If the bill is to be recommitted to the committee, it will be only for the purpose of killing time. I think if the Senate establishes this precedent it will find itself in a very uncomfortable position, because we all know that it is very difficult to secure a full majority of committees at this time. Members of the Senate are engaged in matters pending before so many committees that it is almost impossible to attend all the committee meetings, and I am very firm in the conviction that if we are to legislate—and I think Congress ought to enact some legislation and not spend all its time investigating matters—it will be necessary to pursue the usual practice.

This is an important bill; it has passed the other House, where it originated at the suggestion of the Federal Reserve Board. I understand that board is unanimously in favor of the bill. It seems to me that the point of the Senator from Wisconsin is purely for the purpose of delaying action upon the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose now to delay, and I think I can fairly state that I have never pursued the practice of delaying the consideration of bills; but the learned chairman of the committee has just referred to an informal meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee which was held on Saturday. I believe that there were four members of the committee present at that time. We did have an informal conference, and I think it was very instructive to everyone who was there.

The Senator from Connecticut has said that he understands that the Federal Reserve Board is unanimously in favor of this bill. Gov. Harding, of that board, was before the committee informally. He is in favor of this bill, but I wish Senators here on the floor could have heard his argument in favor of it. I have the very highest opinion of Gov. Harding; I think he is one of the highest-class men in the public service, but I say—and I say it with all due respect—that to my mind his statement of the reasons for the bill in its present shape were anything but convincing, and I should like to have had the entire committee hear the statement.

Perhaps I am wrong about the position I have taken upon this subject; I do not think I am; and my belief is that if the question were left to the consideration of the depositors in the banks or the stockholders in the banks, they would not favor this bill as it is at present drawn. My belief is that they would favor the amendments which I intend to propose. I may be mistaken in that belief, but I think it is only just that the Senate should have this brief statement. If the Chair sees fit to overrule the point of order, very well; but I understand the point of order raised by the Senator from Wisconsin has been invoked on several occasions on the floor of the Senate. I remember it having been invoked very distinctly; but I do not have the exact case in mind.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Wisconsin pointed out the particular rule to which he appealed in connection with his point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. Jefferson's Manual, page 257.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, it is something in Jefferson's Manual and not in the rules of the Senate? As I understand, the record shows that this bill came to the Senate regularly; that it was referred to the proper committee, the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that the committee reported it back to the Senate.

As to the procedure in the committee, that is a matter for the committee itself to regulate. There is no question raised by any member of the committee that the committee's procedure was irregular or that it did not properly consider the bill. As I understand, the committee proceeded in a manner that has grown to be quite the common practice. When a meeting is held, a quorum is not present, and it is important to dispose of matters before the committee, the clerk or some member of the committee who has charge of the measure polls the committee and reports the bill, if a majority favor it.

It is not necessary that there should be any written report on the subject; that is not required by any rule of the Senate. It is not necessary that there should be any formal procedure in order that the bill may come back to the Senate, except that the committee shall report it. The committee has reported the bill; it is regularly on the calendar, and it is a matter to be taken up at the option of the Senate.

Now the motion is made to proceed to the consideration of the bill. It is regularly here and regularly on the calendar. Of course, when it comes to the merits of the question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule, if no Senator desires to be heard.

Mr. LENROOT. I am sure that the Chair will remember that this identical question has been before the Senate on other occasions, and there has never been any question raised as to the rule that the committee must have a formal meeting before reporting a bill to the Senate. A poll of the committee is not sufficient to give the Senate jurisdiction.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question in connection with this matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to inquire if there is a case in point where the polling of a committee rather than a formal meeting caused the matter in question to be recommitted to the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule, but of course it is his duty to hear any Senator who desires to speak.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am merely asking the question if there is any record of a case where the polling of a committee was not considered a legal procedure under the rule?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in partial reply to the inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina, with the permission of the Chair, I will state that I know of no such decision. In the body at the other end of the Capitol the rule is uniform that after a report has been received and consideration of the bill reported has begun a point of order that the bill was not properly reported by the committee does not lie. That is the status of this case. So far as I know, although I have had no opportunity to investigate the authorities, there is no decision of the Senate that would authorize the Chair to determine that a bill on the calendar had been improperly reported. In the House I think that when a question of that kind is raised the matter is sometimes submitted to the body. If the Chair is in doubt as to the propriety of this report, upon the point of order being raised, I think the question should be submitted to the Senate rather than that the Chair should decide it after the consideration of the bill has proceeded for some days. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact of which I have been reminded that the telegraph and telephone control bill, of which I was in charge, was recommitted to the committee, but that action was taken because it was shown that a majority of the committee had not reported it. We had what was called a working majority, which the committee decided was sufficient to report the bill out, but the Senate decided that an actual numerical majority of the committee was essential properly to report the bill; and it was on that ground that the Senate decided that the bill was not properly before the Senate, because a majority of the committee had not signed the report. But I think even if the point had been raised to which the Senator from Arkansas now calls the attention of the Senate, possibly the point of order would not have been sustained, because, according to the precedents established, once a bill is reported and received as coming from a committee, the rule is that it is considered as being before the body.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think there can be no doubt of the fact that Jefferson's Manual, under endless decisions, I was going to say—but under many decisions—has been treated as authority in this body, although we have never made it part of the rules, as I think the House has; but under the practice in this body, if there has been no meeting of a committee, and objection is made on that ground, I think the precedents will be found to show that the bill has always been sent back under the rule of Jefferson's Manual. I do not know; I have not had time to look and see whether the question of the stage of the bill has any bearing upon it; but I should like to ask this question of the Senator from Arkansas, if he will allow me:

Is it not the case that where a bill is reported from a committee by a mere poll of the committee, without a meeting, if objection is made when it is attempted to take up the bill the bill always goes back?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it is undoubtedly true, if the objection is made at the time the report is submitted. That is the rule in the House of Representatives.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely the point. The Senator had the books before him?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I think there is no question about that. Whether the objection can be made at a later stage I have not looked up, and I am not prepared to say.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point? The Senate rule is specific upon that question:

A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing, and, unless submitted to the Senate, shall be decided by the Presiding Officer without debate.

And that has been repeatedly ruled in the Senate—that the point of order can be raised at any time during any stage of the proceedings; but the rule is different in the House, of course.

Mr. LODGE. I did not have the book before me, but of course a point of order can be made at any stage. This is a point of order. It certainly is the practice that if the point of order is made before action is taken it is effective, and under the Senate rule it seems to me it is clear that it must be effective at any stage. I think that has been the practice, but I do not dare to speak of it without looking up the precedents.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to make just one suggestion. It does seem to me that to construe our rules to hold that a bill can be taken up by the Senate on a report of a committee and debated and debated and debated, and then, after days of work upon it, the point can be made that the committee's report was not as formal as it should have been, would put us in a rather awkward position.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, does not the Senator consider that nothing could be more dangerous than to permit some members of a committee, or perhaps even a bare majority, to have the right to sign a bill here while walking about the Senate Chamber and then report it without any meeting of the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But, Mr. President, if anybody objects to what they did, if it was not a unanimous conclusion of the committee, the time to make the point, it seems to me, was when the matter first came before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Our rules say that the point of order is good at any time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think that is the kind of point of order which was referred to.

Mr. LODGE. If this is not a point of order, what is it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is an objection to a report of a committee.

Mr. LODGE. But it is a point of order, of course. It can not be anything else.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so. I do not think it is the kind of point of order that the rule has in view.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this only demonstrates the dangers that come from reporting bills by polling committees. I have been in the Senate over 16 years, and I have never signed a bill to be reported to the Senate in the way of a poll. I made up my mind when I first came to the Senate that it was wrong in principle. I never expect to do it, no matter how much longer I may serve in the Senate; and I should like to see the time come when no bill will ever be reported to this body unless it comes from a committee meeting, and at that meeting a majority of the committee, or at least a working majority of that comittee, report it out favorably.

I have always understood that Jefferson's Manual was made a part of our rules. Of course, it has not been adopted by the Senate, as it has in the House; I am perfectly aware of that; but I have always understood that it was a part of the rules on the decision of any question. It seems to me that the Senator from Massachusetts has stated the case exactly as it is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as illustrative of the fact that the rule cited by the Senator from Wisconsin does not apply to all points of order, let me point out the fact that some of the decisions sustain that contention. For instance:

If point of order is not made against an amendment to an appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole, it is too late to make it in the Senate, the question having been submitted if a point of order can not at any time be raised when the Senate wishes.

Now, there is a case exactly in point upon the general principle asserted by the Senator from Wisconsin. The very question raised then was as to the meaning of this rule cited by the Senator from Wisconsin, and whether a point of order could affect the matter when made at any time; and the decision, in a large number of cases, was to the effect that the point of order could not be made under those circumstances, notwithstanding the rule which provides that a point of order may be made at any time; and the reason in that case applies with greater force in this case.

Here is an instance where the Senate has taken consideration of a bill and has discussed it for several days, has amended it, and is almost ready to determine the matter. Now the question is raised as to whether the Senate has jurisdiction of the subject matter, whether the committee has actually made a report. I think it is worthy at least of consideration whether the Senate did not waive the right to insist upon a formal meeting of the committee when it took jurisdiction of the subject and proceeded to act upon the committee report, just as it did in the cases to which I have referred.

I have nothing further to submit.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator remembers, does he not, that within the last 60 days this very question has been before the Senate? The Chair rules that the point of order could be made at any stage of the proceedings, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who raised the point, now has, I believe, a proposed amendment to the rules so that the point of order must be made at the beginning of the proceedings.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not have in mind the precedent to which the Senator refers. I was not present when that question arose, but I do submit that the Senate, having received the report of a committee and having assumed to act upon it and to consider the bill, at this stage of the proceedings the Chair ought not to determine that the Senate has not jurisdiction of it. The Senate, of course, can itself send the bill back to the committee and the question can be determined in that way by a vote of the Senate; but we all know that for years the custom has prevailed in the Senate of obtaining committee reports by the process of polling Members. Now the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has denounced that process, and it may be that he is right about it; but, nevertheless, it is the practice of the Senate, as the Senator from Utah will concede.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. It has occurred in a great many instances; and I say that, so far as my experience goes, there never has been an instance where the Senate waived any question of a formal meeting of the committee, accepted the report made by the chairman of the committee on the basis of a poll, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, continued that consideration for a very long period, and then, upon a point of order, sent the bill back to the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And took away from the Senate the subject which it was considering. The Senate, of course, can send it back if it wants to. The Senate has perfect power to send it back.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly; it can recommit the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But, after the Senate has taken the bill and worked upon it and worked upon it, surely the point comes too late.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Just a word with reference to this matter of waiver. In the first place, it is very clear that there can be no waiver; but I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that, while this bill has been before the Senate on a number of occasions, it was not until the last time the bill was before the Senate that it developed that there never had been a meeting of the Senate committee. It was just before we concluded the consideration of the bill that it was stated upon this floor that there never had been a meeting of the committee, and nothing but a poll; and this is the first opportunity I have had to raise the point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one word.

The case cited by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has reference only to appropriation bills; and the Chair will remember, and no doubt knows, that there are certain rules applying to appropriation bills that apply to no other bills before this body. That comes about because of the fact that in the closing days of a session if all the rules applying to other bills were applied to appropriation bills, perhaps we never could get an appropriation bill through. Not only that, but it applies to appropriation bills only after the bill has gone out from Committee of the Whole into the Senate. A point of order can be made against any item, even in an appropriation bill, as long as the bill is in Committee of the Whole, but after an appropriation bill passes from the Committee of the Whole into the Senate no point of order can be made against it, unless reserved. That is the only difference between a bill of this character and an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present temporary occupant of the chair has a high regard for the opinions of all the Senators who have spoken on this question, but he does not deem it necessary at this time to pass on some of the questions that have been raised.

The reports of committees, both the reports of standing committees and the reports of conference committees, were analogous and in pari materia up to the time of the adoption of paragraph 2 of Rule XXVII. Until that time and for many years prior thereto the remedy in the Senate was to move to recommit the subject matter to the committee of conference or to the standing committee whenever a committee exceeded its jurisdiction. In the Sixty-fifth Congress the Senate saw fit to change the rule as to reports from conference committees, and did adopt a rule, which is now the rule of the Senate, to wit, that when the conferees exceed their authority a point of order would lie against the report, but the Senate did not treat or deal with reports of standing committees. Hence the rule expressio unius est exclusio alterius would apply—"the expression of one is the exclusion of the other." The Senate saw fit to change the rule regarding the reports of conference committees, but not the rule as to the reports of standing committees, hence the Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that, in the opinion of the Chair, the remedy is to move to recommit the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I do so not because of any interest in this bill, but because I think the Senate ought to clearly understand the position that it would take and the precedent that it would create in sustaining the decision of the Chair upon this ruling. If the decision of the Chair on this ruling is sustained, it means that any committee of the Senate need hold no formal meeting whatever upon any bill that is referred to it, but that the signatures of a majority of the committee may be procured and the bill reported to the Senate. Thus the Senate, acting upon the belief that the committee has acted formally and has considered the matter formally, as the rules require, are misled, and the rules have been violated, because there never has been any action by the committee upon the bill.

Mr. President, upon the peace treaty that is now before us, if the decision of the Chair should be sustained, the majority of the members of the Foreign Relations Committee might never have called a meeting of the committee. A majority of them might have signed the report, giving the minority no opportunity to meet in committee or propose amendments. And yet, under the ruling of the Chair, the Senate would have jurisdiction and the only remedy would be a motion to recommit, the minority having no opportunity whatever to present the matter in committee, or be heard in the report.

That is what the Senate would bring itself to if this ruling were sustained. No further meetings of a committee will be necessary upon any bill, Mr. President, under the ruling that the Chair has made. The mere signatures upon the back of a bill, however important it may be, will be sufficient to give the Senate jurisdiction of that bill. If the Senate desires to make that kind of a precedent, well and good; but I can not permit it to go without an appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, of course, can not argue, but wishes to say he may not go de-hors the record. The Chair is bound by the record. On the calendar which is printed for us this morning we find Calendar No. 126—this bill. The calendar prepared by the Secretary under the authority of the Senate gives the bill as having been reported without amendment. The Chair on its own ipse dixit can not, of course, refer the bill back to the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, permit me one observation. The chairman of the committee this morning has informed the Chair that there never was a formal meeting of the committee upon the bill, and that the bill was reported upon a poll. So the Chair is in full possession of all the facts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word in support of the ruling of the Chair. This bill was reported weeks ago. It stayed on the calendar. It was called up in the Senate. It has been considered by the Senate. It has been considered a number of times by the Senate and has been amended by the Senate.

Mr. President, the serious danger that the Senator from Wisconsin has conjured up is not as serious as he has described it. If the time ever comes when a bill has been reported to the Senate in this way and members of the committee desire the bill to go back, that there may be a hearing on it, the Senate always has control of it. The Senate can send the bill back to the committee for consideration, though it is in the Senate. The Senate has control of it. No harm, no danger, could come from the situation which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has described.

I submit that the decision of the Chair was right. This bill having been before the Senate day after day for consideration, it would indicate certainly a condition of our rules that was almost foolish if the Senate could not, if it desired to do so, proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move to lay the appeal of the Senator from Wisconsin on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I wish to be heard just a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I withdraw the motion, that the Senator from Ohio may be heard.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I should regret exceedingly if the ruling of the Chair were to continue as a rule of this body. I say that with all due respect for one who I know is usually right. But why do we have committees? We have these committees so that Senators can get together and counsel together, so that objections may be raised and considered in the committee; so that they may have the benefit of hearings if, in the judgment of members of the committee, it is so desired.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Ohio?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that on Thursday last the chairman of the committee wrote a letter to each member of the committee inclosing a copy of this bill and requesting a full attendance of the committee for the purpose of considering the bill. That meeting was held on Saturday last, and I think it hardly lies in the voice of the Senator from Ohio to suggest that opportunity was not given to any member of the committee to appear in committee and oppose the bill if he saw fit.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if my good friend the Senator from Connecticut will possess his soul in peace he will not find any fault with what I am going to say. I am arguing the parliamentary question now, and not the question as to what was done as to this particular bill. I am calling attention to the reasons which prevail for committee hearings. If we are not supposed to have hearings, if it is a proper practice to go about and poll a committee—and I have done it, as other Senators have when there were matters of minor importance pending—why refer bills to a committee at all? Why not do it right in the open Senate? We know that that would be bad practice; that it would lead to most vicious legislation.

For that reason it seems to me that we must sustain what the practice of the Senate is, when the question is raised, so that the Senate may have the benefit of the views of the committee, whether they are later approved by the Senate or not.

What is the situation? A bill comes before the Senate. It is true that I was visited by the clerk of the committee in my office and asked to approve it, as he said, by the direction of the chairman of the committee. I read it over, and said I could not approve it. Later on the bill was presented here in the Senate. It developed, as was stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, I think on the last day that the bill was under discussion, that there was no meeting of the committee. This matter was brought up in the Senate, and without its being referred back to the committee—and, of course, that is a technical point that I do not seek to take any advantage of at all—the chairman of the committee did, on Thursday probably, send to me—at least I received it—a notice that he was going to call his committee together on Saturday for a hearing. I went there at the appointed hour. The distinguished chairman was there, and during the course of the meeting I think two other members of the committee, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and after one or the other of them went out the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] came in. They sent then for the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and while the governor was there I think there were four Senators present at least a part of the time.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow me, I was present the whole time, from beginning to end.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is correct. I accept the Senator's statement, in any event.

Mr. FLETCHER. And the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] were present.

Mr. POMERENE. Here is the situation. We have this very important bill, which deals with the amount of money that a single borrower can get out of a bank. It has not been heard and considered by the full committee, and I have such confidence in the committee as to justify me in saying that I would attach greater importance to the judgment of the committee when they were all together and exchanging their views, than when they indorse a bill as they may be polled from time to time.

The question here is a point of order merely. An appeal has been taken from the ruling of the Chair. To sustain the ruling means substantially that it is not necessary, under the rules of the Senate, to have a committee at all, but all that it is necessary to do is to have your committee polled. I am not willing, for one, to have that precedent established.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I move that the appeal of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] be laid upon the table.

Mr. LENROOT. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Capper	Cummins	Elkins
Ball	Chamberlain	Curtis	Fall
Beckham	Colt	Dial	Fletcher
Brandegee	Culberson	Dillingham	France
Gay	Lodge	Poindexter	Sutherland
Hale	McCumber	Pomerene	Swanson
Harris	McKellar	Robinson	Thomas
Harrison	McLean	Sheppard	Trammell
Henderson	New	Simmons	Underwood
Hitchcock	Newberry	Smith, Ariz.	Wadsworth
Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Smith, Md.	Walsh, Mont.
Kellogg	Overman	Smith, S. C.	Williams
Kendrick	Page	Smoot	Wolcott
Keyes	Penrose	Spencer
Kirby	Phelan	Stanley
Lenroot	Phipps	Sterling

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate by illness. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of excutive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to raise the question that there was an appeal from the decision of the Chair pending and the yeas and nays were ordered on that appeal, and I submit that that pending business ought to be disposed of.

Mr. LODGE. The only proceeding of the Senate that can not be interrupted is a call of the roll and that had not been begun. We do not necessarily have to have the yeas and nays immediately when ordered. I have known the yeas and nays to be ordered and carried over for 10 days or two weeks. There is nothing privileged in that situation, and I made a privileged motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What we meant to do was to appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to withhold his motion until we can have this vote and get through with the question that is before the Senate, at least that is what I had hoped to do.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to suggest to the Chair that the unfinished business would be placed before the Senate at 2 o'clock, and a privileged motion occupies exactly the same status.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without respect to the merits of the point of order, it comes too late. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts had been made and agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We were not making a point of order. We are merely asking to get rid of the matter that was before the Senate. I have no doubt the motion to proceed to executive business in open session was in order.

Mr. LENROOT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, I shall be glad to grant the request, but the question of order now before the Senate and still open to debate is a very serious question, I am told. I do not know but that it may lead to a good deal of debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I point out the fact that under the present parliamentary status the question is not open to debate. The question is on the motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware of the parliamentary status.

Mr. ROBINSON. The parliamentary status is that yeas and nays were ordered on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to lay on the table the appeal of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], from the decision of the Chair, and of course the motion of the Senator from Arkansas is not debatable.

Mr. LODGE. I have made the motion, and it has been agreed to, and we are in open executive session. The regular order, of course, is to proceed with the treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it will be necessary to reconsider the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that I rose and addressed the Chair before his motion was put and did my best to get recognition in order to present this matter at the time. It is not our fault.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if the Senate desires to return to legislative session, that can be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I move that we reconsider the action just had, solely for the purpose——

Mr. LODGE. All the Senator needs to do is to move to return to legislative session.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I make that motion, Mr. President, solely for the purpose stated. If the Senate holds that the bill is not here in regular order it ought to be sent back to the committee at once, and we ought to get it into shape to bring it before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], that the Senate resume legislative session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to lay on the table the appeal by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be excused from voting on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from Arizona will be excused from voting. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Arizona is excused. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I am unable to secure a transfer, and in his absence I refrain from voting. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "yea."

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, is not in the Senate Chamber. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. OWEN. I have a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE]. I transfer that pair to my colleague the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "yea."

Mr. HENDERSON. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 37, as follows:

So the Senate refused to lay on the table Mr. LENROOT's appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the decision of the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber while this debate was proceeding except for a moment at the beginning, but I am glad it has been reopened, for I think the decision is a very dangerous one, indeed. There can be no doubt about the principle laid down in Jefferson's Manual. The only point, as I understand, that is made is that if any action has been taken on a bill reported simply by a poll of some members of the committee, it is then removed from liability to the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought we could dispose of the matter at once on the motion to lay on the table; but that having been lost, I do not ask the further indulgence of the Senate to avoid the executive session.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to complete what I have to say on this subject.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I only wanted that understood, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. LODGE. I do not propose to take any time. The question is not yet decided.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that.

Mr. LODGE. All the Senate has done is to refuse to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that.

Mr. LODGE. And as the Senate has refused to lay it on the table, I desire to state my opinion that it is a very dangerous thing to permit the consideration of a bill by the Senate if the point of order is raised that the bill has not been considered by the committee, but has been reported here on a poll. I think that opens a very dangerous situation.

The principle of Jefferson's Manual is a perfectly correct one. Committees are appointed to consider measures. Sometimes it is necessary, and on unimportant bills it is not uncommon to poll a committee, and if no objection is made, that is all right; but if objection is made and if a Senator feels that a bill has not had the proper consideration of the committee, I think the principle laid down in Jefferson's Manual ought to be observed. We may get a bill in here on the poll of a bare majority of a committee, and if there is one day's discussion about it or if an amendment is offered to it, it is beyond the reach of the point of order, according to the decision, as I understand. I earnestly hope the Senate will consider well before it alters what I think has been the general practice heretofore.

Mr. McLEAN and Mr. UNDERWOOD addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask unanimous consent to move that the bill be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to withhold that request for a moment in order that I may address myself briefly to the pending question. I do not wish to object to his request.

Mr. President, I think the decision of the question now pending before the Senate is of vast importance to the orderly transaction of the business of the Senate. I know that Mr. Jefferson in his manual, which has been followed in the main by the two Houses of Congress, holds that a committee is not organized to act unless it acts together; and clearly that is logical and true. Jefferson's Manual, though, has never been adopted by the Senate as a part of its rules, as it has been by the House of Representatives. Therefore it is only binding on the Senate so far as the reasoning is concerned, and not so far as the rule is concerned.

But admitting that the proper action for a committee is to assemble in the room assigned to it, discuss the question of the bill pending before it, and decide by majority vote what shall be done—admitting that that is the logical way to work out the disposition of a bill, yet I think under the rules of the Senate it is impossible to transact the public business in that way.

I was little surprised when I first came to the Senate to find that a vast number of bills were reported to the Senate by the members of the committees giving their consent, either verbally or in writing, to the report of a bill. I felt some opposition to that practice when I first came here, because I had been trained in a different school; but I afterwards realized that the conditions in the Senate compelled the committees or the chairmen of the committees to follow that precedent.

The Senate is so organized and its committees are so large that a Senator has to serve on a number of committees; and, having to serve on a number of committees, there is continual conflict between meetings of the committees. The situation is familiar to us all. In many instances a committee has to secure the presence of a quorum over the telephone, because Members of the Senate who belong to the particular committee which desires to act are at the same time transacting their legislative business before some other committee of which they are members. Of course, if the Senate would change its rules and reduce the size of the committee to a limit that would be commensurate with the size of the Senate, and limit a Senator to membership on one or two committees, then we could transact business in an orderly way.

My objection to establishing an order against what has been the practice of the Senate for many years in allowing bills to be reported by giving consent is not in reference to the big bills or matters of great importance to the country. As a general rule a majority of the committee can be had at most of the hearings and at the time action is taken on such measures; but if by this vote we wipe out the precedent that a bill may be reported to the Senate, although there has not been an actual meeting of the committee, where a majority of the members of the committee, understanding what the bill is and being in favor of it, have given their consent in writing to its being reported, then we send to the wastebasket all the smaller or less important bills that come before this body if there is one Senator who desires to raise the point of order. Other Senators know as well as I do, in view of the manner in which the committees of the Senate are organized, that the bills of less importance to the country—I might say of less general interest to the country, because some of the bills not of great general interest are of vast importance to the people who are interested in them—that if we establish a precedent of that kind by the vote of the Senate to-day, we are sending to the discard minor bills that come before the Senate for consideration.

I do not contend against the logic of the argument; I do not contend against the principle laid down by Mr. Jefferson in his manual. That is the logical and proper way to handle business; but the way the Senate is organized it is the impossible way to handle business, and until we reform the Senate by cutting down the number of committees and the memberships of the committees so that the men who are on the committees can attend to public business, I think we had better follow this precedent, so that bills can come before the Senate promptly for consideration.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think there is any purpose of laying down the rule that no bill shall be reported in that way on a poll of the committee. I am not aware of that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Senator will agree that if this precedent is adopted, then any other bill reported in this way will be subject to a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. It ought to be subject to a point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is where I differ with the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. It is a very dangerous privilege to give and one easily abused. Now, I appreciate about the committees just as much as the Senator from Alabama. I know they are large; I know how hard it is to get a quorum; but most of the committees, or many of them, certainly have a quorum for the transaction of certain business, and it is always possible for a Member who can not be present at a committee meeting to authorize his vote to be cast or to be called at the time and have the vote taken. I think taking away the right to make a point of order, and allowing bills to come here that never have been before a committee, without any check upon it, is a very dangerous step to take.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, the Senator says that it is a subterfuge to report a bill by a majority of the committee signing their names to it and approving it. It seems to me far more of a subterfuge to call a man over the telephone and ask him to be noted as present, when he does not even know what is going on. I would much prefer to have a bill reported by a majority of the committee with their names signed to a paper approving of the bill than to have a fictitious committee meeting when a majority was not present, and men were voted and counted present over the telephone; and that is what is done.

Now, I am not criticizing the situation. I am not criticizing the chairman of the committee. The whole fault and error lies in the Senate rules, in attempting to put on Senators more of the business of these committees than they can attend to.

Mr. LODGE. I think the privilege of doing that ought to be guarded by preserving the right on the part of Members of the Senate to make the point of order. As a matter of fact, it is rarely raised. Most of the bills that come here on polls are unobjected bills, and there is no trouble about it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to set forth a matter that has been called to my attention? Our rule expressly provides for a case like this, and the requirement is that no report of a committee shall be made except by the concurrence of more than one-half of a majority of its entire membership. That is part of a rule adopted April 12, 1912, if I remember correctly, and was introduced in the Senate by the former Senator from Arkansas, Mr. Clarke, for the express purpose of meeting such a case as this.

I do not desire to object to the request made by the chairman, because, in my opinion, a re-reference of the bill to the committee will facilitate the action of the Senate upon the bill; but I do not want the occasion to pass without affirming, as the Senator from Alabama has affirmed, that if the Senate takes this step it only denies itself the privilege of considering the great majority of bills that are introduced here and which may be of importance either in a local or in some other less-than-general way; and I think it may well be understood that the rules of the Senate do authorize a committee of the Senate, when that committee is satisfied that the Senate should have a chance to consider a bill by the concurrence of a majority of the membership of that committee, to pass the consideration of the subject to the Senate.

In partial reply to the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts that the precedent is a dangerous one, I assert that it is in the interest of prompt and wholesome legislation, for at last the committees of the Senate are but the agencies and instruments of that body. They are designed to bring to the Senate legislation for the consideration of that body; and when, as in a case of this character, a majority of a committee having jurisdiction of a bill make a report in favor of it, and the Senate, without objection, and with a full knowledge of the way in which the report was made, takes jurisdiction of the bill, considers it for several days, and amends it, it is not in the interest of legislation, it is not to preserve the dignity of the Senate, that a point of order should be made depriving the Senate—which is supreme over its committees—of the power to determine the questions involved. No harm can come to the United States if the Senate considers measures that are introduced and reported by polling the committee and passes or defeats them, for the Senate, and not the committee, is the body primarily responsible for the exercise of the power of legislation.

Take this case as an illustration of what might occur should the precedent contended for by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts prevail.

The statement was made a week or more ago on the floor of the Senate that this bill had been reported by the concurrence of a majority of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency without a formal meeting of the committee. Any Senator might then have made the point of order, and the time of the Senate would have been conserved by doing so; but we proceeded to debate this bill on two or three occasions by vote of the Senate to proceed to its consideration. We resumed consideration of the measure. We adopted, if I remember correctly, some amendments to the bill. In the meantime, as stated by the Senator from Connecticut, the committee was called together. Every member of the committee, including the Senator from Ohio, was invited and urged to attend a formal meeting of the committee. The committee met and heard a discussion of this bill and adhered to its action.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Is the statement correct that there were only four members present?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I am informed that it is not correct; but I was not present and I would not undertake to state what the proceedings of the committee were, except as stated by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Connecticut. I make this point, however, that after the chairman of the committee had exerted himself to secure the attendance of Senators on the committee for the express purpose of considering this bill, notwithstanding the fact that the Senate had been discussing it for several days and had amended it, and notwithstanding the further fact that no point of order had been made against the committee report, after the Senator from Connecticut had done his best to secure the attendance of Senators who belonged to the committee, some of the very Senators, including the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], found themselves unable to attend the meeting of the committee. There was no effort made, so far as I am informed, in the meeting that was formally called to reverse the action taken by a majority of the members of the committee. Nobody proposed in the committee to recommit the bill. The committee, by every rule of reason and justice, in every way that it can be, is committed to the report on this bill.

A majority of the members of the committee, in pursuance of the clause adopted in April, 1912, to meet just such a case as this, signed a favorable report on this bill. The Senate took it up and discussed it for days. The statement was made on the floor that the committee had not had a formal meeting, and the chairman of the committee did his best to get a formal meeting. He sent a copy of the bill to every Senator on the committee and urged him to attend. What more could he do? The Senators who did attend made no effort to reverse the action taken through the concurrence of a majority of the committee. Now, after the Senate, which is master of its committees—I dare you to assert a contrary doctrine—has again resumed the consideration of the matter we are asked to say that in the interest of fair legislation, in the interest of justice, this time which the Senate has devoted to the bill must be counted as wasted and the committee and the chairman of the committee must suffer the reflection which would result from the proposed action.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what becomes of the amendments that the Senate has already made to this bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who can answer that question. The Senate has already acted in part upon the bill, and the bill now goes to the committee, if it goes at all, with amendments adopted by the Senate; so if you want to test the sense of the Senate on the subject you ought to make a motion to recommit the bill.

As before stated, I shall not object to the request of the Senator from Connecticut; but I merely want to assert that instead of——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. I made the motion, or asked permission to make the motion, because I think it is unfortunate that this should be made a party matter. I am interested in the bill, and I think it is a wise, sound piece of legislation, and it is for that reason that I made the motion. I think it will expedite the progress of the bill if it is recommitted to the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I concur in all that the Senator from Connecticut has said, and as an evidence of that fact, and as conclusive proof of that, I conclude what I have to say on the subject.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I want to say just a word on the construction of the rule suggested by the Senator from Arkansas which he now invokes as authorizing reports of committees, and I do it only because I do not think the record should stand as he has made it. He referred to subdivision 3 of Rule XXV; but, unfortunately for him, he read only the last paragraph of the rule. If the Senator had read all of the rule he would have seen that instead of being in his favor the rule is conclusive against him. Let me read that rule. It reads:

> That the several standing committees of the Senate having a membership of more than three Senators are hereby respectively authorized to fix, each for itself, the number of its members who shall constitute a quorum thereof for the transaction of such business as may be considered by said committee; but in no case shall a committee, acting under authority of this resolution, fix as a quorum thereof any number less than one-third of its entire membership, nor shall any report be made to the Senate that is not authorized by the concurrence of more than one-half of a majority of such entire membership.

It was only the last phrase that the Senator read; but he will see that it was dealing with a rule of the Senate that would permit committees to act with less than a majority of its members present to constitute a quorum. The very purpose of the rule was to meet the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. It provides that committees may act with less than a majority; that they may act with one-third of the membership constituting a quorum; but then comes the provision the Senator from Arkansas invokes, that in such cases, nevertheless, they must have a majority of a majority concurring in that one-third quorum. That was the purpose of it. Otherwise a majority of one-third of the committee could report a bill. So in providing for a quorum as low as one-third of the membership it was provided that, nevertheless, it must take one-fourth of the entire membership to order the report of a bill. So this rule, if there were any question about it before, settles conclusively that a committee can not act, except by assembling and meeting formally together; and provision is made that in such a case one-third of the entire membership may constitute a quorum, but there must be an affirmative vote in such case of at least half a majority of the entire membership.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would not take up the time of the Senate now if I did not feel that the settlement of this question is very material and almost vital and that it ought to be determined properly in order that the Senate may properly consider legislation.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to suggest that the settlement of the question on the motion pending is limited; that it simply decides whether the bill shall be recommitted. It leaves the record in this shape: A point of order was raised by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to the consideration of the bill for the reasons stated. The Chair overruled the point of order, and an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair. The pending question is the appeal. If the bill is recommitted, that is the end of the whole situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator from Florida asking me a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the end of the whole matter. The bill would be recommitted.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator had permitted me to get my second sentence delivered to the Senate, he would have ascertained that I am not in favor of the motion to recommit the bill. I want this appeal decided, so that we may determine now, I hope once for all, the question that is at issue. I understand the parliamentary situation, I think. At least, I understand it the same as the Senator from Florida has explained it. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], I understand, did not make a motion. He attempted to get recognition, and said he wanted to ask unanimous consent. If that unanimous consent is requested, I am going to object. I hope the Senate will vote on this appeal, and let us decide now whether it is proper for a committee report to come into the Senate on a simple poll of the members of the committee, without any meeting of the committee.

Mr. President, that kind of a procedure would be revolutionary. It absolutely disregards every principle of parliamentary procedure, either in the committee or in the Senate. A committee is not a committee unless it meets as a committee. You might just as well say that when a bill is introduced here we could take that bill and go around and have every Member of the Senate, or a majority of the Senate, sign on the back of it a statement that "I am in favor of it," and then by such signatures have the Secretary certify to the House that the Senate had passed the bill. That would be on all fours with what we have before us now.

The point is made, and made well, that if the proper rule were enforced it would sometimes be difficult on account of the many committees on which each individual Senator holds membership. That is true, and the condition which confronts us now only brings us face to face with a proposition that has often been called to the attention of the Senate, that Members of the Senate are on too many committees. The committees ought to be cut down in membership, and Senators ought not to be allowed to serve on a lot of committees. We are all on too many committees. A man can not meet with three or four committees when they all meet at the same time. So if we are going to adopt a rule such as the gentlemen on the other side would like to have us construe this rule, that you can get a bill reported to the Senate by a simple poll of the committee to which it was referred, without ever having the committee meet, then we might as well disregard all committees; there should be none.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says "this will not be urged against an important bill." Who is going to decide whether they are big bills or little bills? This is considered to be a big bill by a good many, and by some of us a small bill. If we adopt this precedent, then it would be possible, in the case of a tariff bill, to have the Finance Committee polled, and in the case of a political bill like that, as it has always been, you could get a majority of the committee to sign their names on the back of a tariff bill and have a report made the next day.

The theory of having a committee act on a bill is to give some information to the body to which the committee reports. They are to have hearings, they are to give it consideration, they are to consider amendments, and take everything into consideration that has any possible bearing upon the subject under consideration.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, is it not also exceedingly important that the minority of a committee shall have a chance to attend a meeting and express their opinions before a report is made?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly it is; and it has happened nine times out of ten that when a bill is brought up for consideration in a committee the minority, those who oppose, as well as those who favor, get their minds working together, and there will be amendments agreed on. You never would have such a thing as a committee amendment if this precedent became the established law of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply desire to interject the observation that if this procedure were adopted permanently by the Senate there could not be contrived a better means of stifling the voice of the minority.

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely not. We would get all kinds of jokers in legislation. It would be the easiest thing in the world to get undesirable legislation before the Senate, and the result would be that the Senate would have bills up for consideration that had never received any consideration from a committee. What we ought to do to meet the legitimate objections that are made is to cut down the membership of the committees. Make it impossible for any one Member of the Senate to be a member of a half dozen great committees of the Senate and you would not have the difficulty that you have now in getting quorums at the meetings of the committees.

Therefore, Mr. President, believing that this is vital, almost revolutionary, in the procedure of the Senate, if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] makes a request for unanimous consent, I want to object to it. I want the appeal voted on. We ought to have a roll call on it and settle this matter once for all.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 7709) to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

REV. E. M. MOWRY AND REV. E. BELL (S. DOC. NO. 107).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

In response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on July 18, 1919, requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interests, to transmit to the Senate the records in the cases and all papers in possession of the State Department connected with the legal proceedings against the Rev. E. M. Mallory (should be Mowry), charged with harboring criminals, and the Rev. Eugene Bell, charged with involuntary homicide, they being citizens of the United States and residents at the time in Korea, I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State on the above-mentioned subjects.

The report of the Secretary of State has my approval.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 29, 1919.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before beginning the reading of the treaty, I ask to have printed the appeal for funds put out by the League to Enforce Peace. It has already been printed in the RECORD, but I should like to have it printed with the comment of the New York Sun in regard to it. I will not ask to have it read again.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From New York Sun, Sept. 21, 1919.]

"PRO-LEAGUERS SEEK BIG FUND—TELEGRAMS SENT TO HUNDRED MEN ASKING EACH FOR $1,000 DONATION—NEED CALLED URGENT—MONEY WILL BE USED FOR PROPAGANDA TO HASTEN RATIFICATION.

"One hundred financially and politically qualified citizens distributed over the eastern part of the country received the following 'very urgent' call yesterday from the League to Enforce Peace, with offices at 130 West Forty-second Street:

"'Crisis at hand will determine whether America joins league of nations or forsakes allies and negotiates separate peace with Germany. Vote for any reservations may require resubmission and endanger treaty. Will you join 99 others in giving $1,000 each to League to Enforce Peace, William H. Taft, president, for immediate use in arousing the country to demand prompt ratification in form that will not send treaty back for further negotiations and delay world pacification? Matter very urgent.

"'GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM,
"'CLEVELAND H. DODGE,
"'OSCAR S. STRAUS,
"'VANCE MCCORMICK,
"'HERBERT S. HOUSTON,
"'Finance Committee, League to Enforce Peace.'

"It is assumed that many of the 100 will respond because the names were selected from a card index conveniently noting the pecuniary ability and equally important detail of the political tendency of the 100 chosen citizens to dig down for the desired cash.

"Excepting Mr. Straus none of the five who signed the telegram could be reached yesterday, but he made it clear that Mr. McCormick had not evolved this idea. It had sprung into being spontaneously in the league's office when the full significance of 'the situation' was comprehended.

"'Publicity costs money,' observed Mr. Straus. 'There has been much misstatement about the league. The money is for publicity, for clarification in the minds of the public.'

"At the league office it was said telegrams were used not so much because this was an S O S to rescue the disputed and precarious document, but because one of the very first rules of all the latest volumes on salesmanship says that 'telegrams get results.'

"The results up to last night were not announced, however."

Mr. LODGE. I also ask to have printed this invitation, dated September 16, 1919, which was widely circulated by the League to Enforce Peace. It reads:

"LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE,
"New York, September 16, 1919.

"DEAR FELLOW COVENANTER: Nearly everybody, except political trimmers and self-seekers, wants the peace treaty and covenant ratified without further delay. Humanity, commerce, industry, labor, the whole social order need ratification now."

As that was written it would mean that humanity, commerce, industry, labor, the whole social order needed ratification. I know what they mean, of course. It continues:

"We urge that you immediately write, telephone, telegraph, or visit Senators and demand prompt and unqualified ratification, and that you get other persons of influence who can bring pressure to do so. No matter if you have done this; do it again and in a positive and conclusive manner. Don't wait on others; strike straight from the shoulder now, and put all your might behind the blow.

"Faithfully, yours, "W. R. BOYD, Jr.,
"National Campaign Manager.
"I. T. JONES,
"Assistant National Campaign Manager."

The first circular that I put in is an appeal for money, in order to bring pressure upon the Senate. This is an appeal to all the best emotions of the human heart to bring pressure on the Senate. I am glad to read it and have it printed, because I think there is a certain unconscious humor in it, and also because it shows that the writers have not gotten beyond the point of considering that everyone who happens to differ from them must be a "political trimmer and self-seeker." I can only say to them by way of advice that machine-made pressure is perfectly obvious to those who have served in the House or the Senate. They know when a letter is real; they know when a telegram is real. They also know when they are machine made.

Now, in the reading of the treaty I believe the Secretary stopped at the beginning of part 2.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the treaty will be proceeded with.

The Secretary read as follows:

"PART II.

It will rest with the Boundary Commissions provided by the present Treaty to specify in each case whether the frontier line shall follow any changes of the course or channel which may take place or whether it shall be definitely fixed by the position of the course or channel at the time when the present Treaty comes into force."

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, before we proceed further with the reading of the treaty, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] whether he has any large maps to be hung on the wall to display these two boundary lines? We have the whole map of Europe practically rewritten, with many new nations created, and I think we would all be pretty much interested in knowing as much about the boundary lines as it has been possible for the members of the committee to know. Those of us not on the committee are not familiar with the boundary lines, and I think we would all be interested in knowing more about the geography of the new Europe, if there is any way we can get at it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am sorry to say that I have no large maps. I suppose they could be prepared. Every Senator has the volume with maps in it, but to follow the boundary lines as the treaty is read is practically an impossibility. It can not be done with the small maps. I think there ought to be some large maps made showing the boundaries that are established for the different countries. I suppose that could be done, and if that is the desire of Senators I will take steps to have it done. I suppose it can be done on the request of the committee. I realize that perhaps the committee has been negligent in not attending to it before. It did not occur to me, I confess, until I heard the boundaries read here, how impossible it is for anybody to follow them or know just what the treaty provides for. I shall take advantage of the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana and see if we can not have some outline maps made which will show the boundaries of Germany—the old boundaries and the new boundaries—and to what other countries portions of Germany have been assigned.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that perhaps he will find such maps already prepared in the State Department. I have been informed that they have maps showing the new boundaries in Europe as agreed upon at Paris.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean large wall maps?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; large wall maps. I have not seen one of them, I will say to the Senator, nor have I seen any maps with the exception of those contained in the volume to which he refers; but I think they are already prepared, and it would be a very good thing to have one here.

Mr. LODGE. If the State Department has them, that will expedite matters very much. I shall make inquiry at once and see if the State Department has large maps which will show the boundaries, new and old.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

"PART III.

"POLITICAL CLAUSES FOR EUROPE.

"Section I.

"BELGIUM.

"Article 31.

"Germany, recognizing that the Treaties of April 19, 1839, which established the status of Belgium before the war, no longer conform to the requirements of the situation, consents to the abrogation of the said Treaties and undertakes immediately to recognize and to observe whatever conventions may be entered into by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, or by any of them, in concert with the Governments of Belgium and of the Netherlands, to replace the said Treaties of 1839. If her formal adhesion should be required to such conventions or to any of their stipulations, Germany undertakes immediately to give it.

"Article 32.

"Germany recognizes the full sovereignty of Belgium over the whole of the contested territory of Moresnet (called Moresnet neutre)."

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the treaty whether the territory referred to in article 32 is that over which the newspaper dispatches inform us Belgium and Holland have come to disagreement and have ruptured diplomatic relations?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that is the territory. However, I should have to look at the map and examine it carefully to answer with any authority. The territory in contest between Holland and Belgium, I understand, is chiefly with reference to what was the Duchy of Lemberg and the navigation of the Scheldt, the ownership of Holland, with which the Senator is familiar, on the southwestern side of the Scheldt, giving Holland control of the waters of the Scheldt. About this there are many treaties in existence, as the Senator from New Hampshire is no doubt aware; but what the Moresnet neutre is I do not pretend to know. I have not looked it up on the map, and I do not know exactly what it is. The Senator can probably find it in one of the maps printed with the treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Article 33.

"Germany renounces in favour of Belgium all rights and title over the territory of Prussian Moresnet situated on the west of the road from Liége to Aix-la-Chapelle; the road will belong to Belgium where it bounds this territory."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think that confirms what I said to the Senator. I think the Dutch and Belgian differences are in regard to territory farther to the westward; that is my impression, because the line in article 33, as the Senator will notice, runs from Liege to Aix-la-Chapelle, and that, as I remember—I am speaking from memory—is in the eastern part of Belgium.

The reading of the treaty was resumed, as follows:

"Article 34.

"Germany renounces in favour of Belgium all rights and title over the territory comprising the whole of the Kreise of Eupen and of Malmédy.

"During the six months after the coming into force of this Treaty, registers will be opened by the Belgian authority at Eupen and Malmédy in which the inhabitants of the above territory will be entitled to record in writing a desire to see the whole or part of it remain under German sovereignty.

"The results of this public expression of opinion will be communicated by the Belgian Government to the League of Nations, and Belgium undertakes to accept the decision of the League."

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, in the course of the reading of this article of the treaty before the Committee on Foreign Relations an amendment was offered which was afterwards withdrawn, and which does not happen, therefore, to be before the Senate at the present time; but it is worth while to call the attention of the Senate in connection with this article to the fact that the disposition of the sovereignty of the Kreise of Eupen and of Malmedy is made in an entirely different manner from other dispositions of sovereignty for which the treaty provides. Here a register is opened and the inhabitants record their desires in writing, with none of the safeguards which the treaty is supposed to throw about the rights of self-determination and with absolutely no interposition of the strong arm of the indispensable instrumentality of which we have heard so much in the last few months.

I merely wish to call the attention of the Senate to this fact in emphasis of the loosely drawn manner in which this treaty was put together and of the skill with which our European associates who sat with us at the council table at Versailles permitted themselves to leave us out of all problems with which they felt entirely confident to deal to their own satisfaction, and the care with which they equally tied us strongly into every problem where they required a goat upon whom they could wish the subsequent results.

The reading of the treaty was resumed, as follows:

"Article 35.

"A Commission of seven persons, five of whom will be appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, one by Germany and one by Belgium, will be set up fifteen days after the coming into force of the present Treaty to settle on the spot the new frontier line between Belgium and Germany, taking into account the economic factors and the means of communication.

"Decisions will be taken by a majority and will be binding on the parties concerned."

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, on page 57, article 35, line 2, before the word "Powers," to strike out the words "and Associated."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this amendment is one of 34, all of which, with two exceptions, are similar or alike; and it makes no difference which one is discussed, because the same principle applies to all of them. Unless the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] particularly desires to go on this afternoon with those amendments, I suggest that we pass them for the present until he is ready to proceed, and that we continue the reading of the treaty. I think it will facilitate the reading if we treat these amendments as one.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the series of amendments to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers is composed altogether of some 30 amendments, and while I should personally very much prefer to adopt the course suggested by the Senator who is in charge of the treaty, I do not care to say that I am not physically able to discuss these amendments at the present time. I would very much prefer, however, to allow the discussion to go over while the amendments are read. I believe the last of these particular amendments is on page 163 of the treaty. The purpose of the amendments is simply to eliminate the United States from the different commissions which are to be provided for in the treaty itself, allowing the allied powers to appoint their own commissions to carry out the purposes expressed in the treaty.

I desire to discuss the matter a little more at length, and I do not think any time will be lost by pursuing the course suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, as the amendments can all be discussed at one time.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator, of course, in suggesting that the entire series of amendments which have come to be known as the Fall amendments are the same, simply means that they are the same in principle. There chances to be, as the Senator well knows, considerable variation in the form and application of the various commissions set up, as, for example, the one under article 35, comprising seven persons, will have not only the membership selected by the principal allied and associated powers, but it will also have the German and Belgium delegates, whereas in many of the other commissions set up under the treaty the stipulations call merely for five delegates or commissioners to be named by the principal allied and associated powers. It is possible, if I may suggest it to the Senator, that it will simplify the debate upon the whole series of amendments of this character if we have them all read before any are debated, inasmuch as there are these variations in form and function.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is entirely correct. It would very much simplify the discussion. Otherwise, in attempting to discuss the series of amendments it would be necessary to anticipate the reading of the treaty, while after the reading is concluded, at least in so far as this series of amendments is concerned, having it behind us, having some understanding of it, the Senate can discuss exactly the differences to which the Senator from New Hampshire has called attention. For instance, I call the attention of the Senate now, on page 77, to this language:

The governing commission—

This is in reference to the Saar Basin—

provided for by paragraph 16, shall consist of five members chosen by the council of the league of nations, and will include one citizen of France, one native inhabitant of the Saar Basin not a citizen of France, and three members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany.

The amendment there is to exclude the United States. So it does not affect the United States, as in the series generally, by simply striking out the words "and associated."

Mr. MOSES. The Senator need not leap so far in the text of the treaty to find differentiations such as those to which I have alluded, because, on page 61, with reference to certain international arrangements relating to the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg the Senator will find that the allied and associated powers are included.

Mr. FALL. I hope the Senate will pursue the course suggested by the Senator in charge of the treaty. There were several questions which were asked the President of the United States with reference to these amendments, and at the proper time I shall call attention to those questions and answers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it was my understanding that after passing over the first two amendments we would consider and vote upon each separate amendment as it was reached; and I feel constrained to object to passing this and other amendments over indefinitely. I would be willing to pass over until to-morrow those that may be reached in the reading to-day so as to give the Senator from New Mexico time to prepare his remarks, if that will be agreeable.

Mr. FALL. I am not assuming to set the time; and, so far as I am personally concerned, I will say to the Senator that that will be perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then we can proceed with the reading as far as we may to-day and take these amendments up to-morrow.

Mr. FALL. I think, as a matter of fact, that if we now proceed without discussion we would get to page 163 possibly, which would cover this series of amendments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should not like to pass these amendments over in that way.

Mr. FALL. I am asking nothing whatsoever, but I will say to the Senator that we will not get a vote if we proceed with the discussion this afternoon. I have no earthly desire to delay, but it will simply be easier to discuss the amendments and to point out the differences between them, their purpose, and how they affect the treaty after they have all been read rather than to undertake to anticipate them by discussing them beforehand. The Senator can see that; but, so far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection to his suggestion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator ready to proceed now with his argument?

Mr. FALL. No; I prefer not to do so.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this presents a somewhat unusual case. Here is a series of amendments extending over a number of pages. The Senator who offered the amendments, which were adopted by the committee, desires to discuss those amendments in a group and dispose of them all at once. The treaty must be read, and it seems to me to make very little difference, so far as time goes, whether it is read now or read at some other time; but this desire to inconvenience a Senator and undertake to say when a Senator must speak on amendments is something I have never seen attempted heretofore in the Senate.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss each amendment as we come to it; the principle involved in each is the same, although the reasons for the amendments are not exactly the same. They can all be disposed of, however, at one time, in my judgment; at least, I am willing to endeavor to discuss them together as intelligently as I may be able to do; but if that course is not pursued, then it will be necessary for me to explain each individual amendment of the thirty odd. So it seems to me that time would be saved by proceeding as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. I assure the Senator from Nebraska that so far as I am concerned there is no purpose of delay at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, we are ready to proceed this afternoon. I think the course I have suggested is a proper one; but if the Senator prefers to make his remarks to-morrow or begin to-morrow I would be willing to pass over the amendments until to-morrow for that purpose.

Mr. FALL. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we might as well understand that the amendments will be passed over or taken up according to the will of the Senate; and I ask now—I move, if it is necessary for me to make a motion, that amendment No. 3 be passed over temporarily.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	McNary	Simmons
Ball	Henderson	Moses	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	Hitchcock	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Johnson, Calif.	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Capper	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smith, S. C.
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Smoot
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Spencer
Curtis	Kendrick	Nugent	Sutherland

Fernald	Knox	Phelan	Trammell
Fletcher	Lenroot	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Gay	Lodge	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Gerry	McCumber	Poindexter	Watson
Harding	McKellar	Ransdell	Williams
Harris	McLean	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, now that the Senators have returned, I should like to explain, before we vote, the point that has arisen.

We have reached, on page 57, the third amendment, "and associated powers." That is one of a series of 32 amendments offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] in the committee, all directed to one purpose, and based on one principle. The Senator from New Mexico desires to discuss those amendments of his en bloc, and the proposition was that this one should be passed over until all of his amendments have been read, because he does not wish to make the same discussion thirty times, once on each amendment. It would save time to do it in that way, and it would enable the Senator from New Mexico to discuss all of his amendments together. If we are obliged to take them up one by one it will greatly protract the debate. The suggestion I made was that we should pass it over temporarily; and, if it is necessary, I move to pass it over temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to passing over the amendment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I made an objection to that, and I will state in doing so that I was perfectly willing to have a unanimous-consent agreement to pass over the amendment until to-morrow if the Senator from New Mexico desired a better occasion or better opportunity on which to present his case; but I do object to the indefinite postponement or to the passing over of the amendment in that way. If the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to arrive at a definite time at which this and other amendments of a similar sort may be considered, that can be easily arranged.

Mr. LODGE. I am making no agreements and giving no assurances which I have no power to give. We came to this amendment in the regular course of business. I have explained why this courtesy should be extended to a Senator, which I have never known to be refused before. As there seems to be objection to it I move that we pass over this third amendment temporarily.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, to that I make the point of order that we are operating under a unanimous-consent agreement for the reading of this treaty for committee amendments, and that no amendment can be passed over indefinitely without unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we are not proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement. We are proceeding under the rule, which is very explicit; and I take it that it is within the power of the Senate to decide when it will take up any one amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are proceeding under this rule:

> When a treaty is reported from a committee with or without amendment, it shall, unless the Senate unanimously otherwise direct, lie one day for consideration, after which it may be read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, when it shall be proceeded with by articles, and the amendments reported by the committee shall be first acted upon, after which other amendments may be proposed; and when through with, the proceedings had as in Committee of the Whole shall be reported to the Senate.

That is far enough to read. We are in Committee of the Whole now in consideration of this treaty. It must be considered in accordance with the rule that applies to the consideration of any other question in the Committee of the Whole. We have reached a pending amendment, and the rules of the Senate provide that—

> When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
> To adjourn.
> To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
> To take a recess.
> To proceed to the consideration of executive business.
> To lay on the table.
> To postpone indefinitely.
> To postpone to a day certain.
> To commit.
> To amend.

If this be a motion simply to pass the amendment over, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now I will say to the Senator from New Mexico that I shall be perfectly willing, on behalf of this side of the Chamber, to agree to take up the amendment to-morrow, and to give him every opportunity to present his case on all the amendments of the same kind. I do not intend any discourtesy to the Senator from New Mexico; and I understand from him that it is entirely acceptable to him to carry out that program, and that it will meet with his convenience.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not see anything in the rule which prevented laying aside an amendment. The limitation of the rule is that the committee amendments shall be considered first. It does not prescribe any order in which they shall be considered. I take it that the committee has the right to call up any of its amendments before anyone else can offer one, and that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is simply ruling in accordance with the invariable rule in the Committee of the Whole, and that is when there is a pending question—and there is one here——

Mr. LODGE. What is the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment has not been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been read.

Mr. LODGE. If the amendment has been read, then it is a pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a pending amendment and the pending question.

Mr. LODGE. And the Chair rules that it can not be laid aside by the vote of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that it can not be laid aside by the Senate. The Chair rules that it can be postponed to a definite time, or you can indefinitely postpone it if you so move.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if that is the ruling of the Chair, I move that this amendment be postponed until this day week.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to postpone the consideration of this amendment for one week. On that motion the yeas and nays are requested. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of California (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and in his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], which I transfer to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. GERRY. The senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate by illness. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are detained from the Senate on public business.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays, 40, as follows:

So Mr. LODGE's motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in my motion I named a time entirely at random. I have no desire to put it at an unreasonable distance, and I ask unanimous consent to change the time from one week to three days hence, and let it apply to all these amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is, to Friday of this week, the 26th?

Mr. LODGE. Friday of this week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is unanimously agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the treaty at the top of page 57, article 35, and read as follows:

"Article 35.

"A Commission of seven persons, five of whom will be appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, one by Germany and one by Belgium, will be set up fifteen days after the coming into force of the present Treaty to settle on the spot the new frontier line between Belgium and Germany, taking into account the economic factors and the means of communication.

"Decisions will be taken by a majority and will be binding on the parties concerned."

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, after the word "Allied," in line 2 of article 35, page 57, to strike out the words "and Associated."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over until Friday.

The reading was continued, as follows:

"Article 36.

"When the transfer of the sovereignty over the territories referred to above has become definite, German nationals habitually resident in the territories will definitively acquire Belgian nationality ipso facto, and will lose their German nationality.

"Nevertheless, German nationals who became resident in the territories after August 1, 1914, shall not obtain Belgian nationality without a permit from the Belgian Government.

"Article 37.

"Within the two years following the definitive transfer of the sovereignty over the territories asigned to Belgium under the present Treaty, German nationals over 18 years of age habitually resident in those territories will be entitled to opt for German nationality.

"Option by a husband will cover his wife, and option by parents will cover their children under 18 years of age.

"Persons who have exercised the above right to opt must within the ensuing twelve months transfer their place of residence to Germany.

"They will be entitled to retain their immovable property in the territories acquired by Belgium. They may carry with them their movable property of every description. No export or import duties may be imposed upon them in connection with the removal of such property.

"Article 38.

"The German Government will hand over without delay to the Belgian Government the archives, registers, plans, title deeds and documents of every kind concerning the civil, military, financial, judicial or other administrations in the territory transferred to Belgian sovereignty.

"The German Government will likewise restore to the Belgian Government the archives and documents of every kind carried off during the war by the German authorities from the Belgian public administrations, in particular from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Brussels.

"Article 39.

"The proportion and nature of the financial liabilities of Germany and of Prussia which Belgium will have to bear on account of the territories ceded to her shall be fixed in conformity with Articles 254 and 256 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Section II.

"LUXEMBURG.

"Article 40.

"With regard to the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, Germany renounces the benefit of all the provisions inserted in her favour in the Treaties of February 8, 1842, April 2, 1847, October 20–25, 1865, August 18, 1866, February 21 and May 11, 1867, May 10, 1871, June 11, 1872, and November 11, 1902, and in all Conventions consequent upon such Treaties.

"Germany recognizes that the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg ceased to form part of the German Zollverein as from January 1, 1919, renounces all rights to the exploitation of the railways, adheres to the termination of the régime of neutrality of the Grand Duchy, and accepts in advance all international arrangements which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers relating to the Grand Duchy."

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, in article 40, on page 61, after the word "Allied," to strike out the words "and Associated."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over until Friday.

The Secretary continued the reading as follows:

"Article 41.

"Germany undertakes to grant to the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, when a demand to that effect is made to her by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, the rights and advantages stipulated in favour of such Powers or their nationals in the present Treaty with regard to economic questions, to questions relative to transport and to aerial navigation."

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, on page 61, in article 41, line 2, after the word "Allied," to strike out the words "and Associated."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over until Friday.

The Secretary continued reading as follows:

"Section III.

"Article 42.

"Germany is forbidden to maintain or construct any fortifications either on the left bank of the Rhine or on the right bank to the west of a line drawn 50 kilometres to the East of the Rhine.

"Article 43.

"In the area defined above the maintenance and the assembly of armed forces, either permanently or temporarily, and military manœuvres of any kind, as well as the upkeep of all permanent works for mobilization, are in the same way forbidden.

"Article 44.

"In case Germany violates in any manner whatever the provisions of Articles 42 and 43, she shall be regarded as committing a hostile act against the Powers signatory of the present Treaty and as calculated to disturb the peace of the world.

"Section IV.

"SAAR BASIN.

"Article 45.

"As compensation for the destruction of the coal-mines in the north of France and as part payment towards the total reparation due from Germany for the damage resulting from the war, Germany cedes to France in full and absolute possession, with exclusive rights of exploitation, unencumbered and free from all debts and charges of any kind, the coal-mines situated in the Saar Basin as defined in Article 48.

"Article 46.

"In order to assure the rights and welfare of the population and to guarantee to France complete freedom in working the mines, Germany agrees to the provisions of Chapters I and II of the Annex hereto.

"Article 47.

"In order to make in due time permanent provision for the government of the Saar Basin in accordance with the wishes of the populations, France and Germany agree to the provisions of Chapter III of the Annex hereto.

"Article 48.

"The boundaries of the territory of the Saar Basin, as dealt with in the present stipulations, will be fixed as follows:

"On the south and south-west: by the frontier of France as fixed by the present Treaty.

"On the north-west and north: by a line following the northern administrative boundary of the Kreis of Merzig from the point where it leaves the French frontier to the point where it meets the administrative boundary separating the commune of Saarhölzbach from the commune of Britten; following this communal boundary southwards and reaching the administrative boundary of the canton of Merzig so as to include in the territory of the Saar Basin the canton of Mettlach, with the exception of the commune of Britten; following successively the northern administrative boundaries of the cantons of Merzig and Haustadt, which are incorporated in the aforesaid Saar Basin, then successively the administrative boundaries separating the Kreise of Sarrelouis, Ottweiler and Saint-Wendel from the Kreise of Merzig, Trèves (Trier) and the Principality of Birkenfeld as far as a point situated about 500 metres north of the village of Furschweiler (viz., the highest point of the Metzelberg).

"On the north-east and east: from the last point defined above to a point about 3½ kilometres east-north-east of Saint-Wendel:

"a line to be fixed on the ground passing east of Furschweiler, west of Roschberg, east of points 418, 329 (south of Roschberg), west of Leitersweiler, north-east of point 464, and following the line of the crest southwards to its junction with the administrative boundary of the Kreis of Kusel;

"thence in a southerly direction the boundary of the Kreis of Kusel, then the boundary of the Kreis of Homburg towards the south-south-east to a point situated about 1000 metres west of Dunzweiler;

"thence to a point about 1 kilometre south of Hornbach:

"a line to be fixed on the ground passing through point 424 (about 1000 metres south-east of Dunzweiler), point 363 (Fuchs-Berg), point 322 (south-west of Waldmohr), then east of Jägersburg and Erbach, then encircling Homburg, passing through the points 361 (about 2½ kilometres north-east by east of that town), 342 (about 2 kilometres south-east of that town), 347 (Schreiners-Berg), 356, 350 (about 1½ kilometres south-east of Schwarzenbach), then passing east of Einöd, south-east of points 322 and 333, about 2 kilometres east of Webenheim, about 2 kilometres east of Mimbach, passing east of the plateau which is traversed by the road from Mimbach to Böckweiler (so as to include this road in the territory of the Saar Basin), passing immediately north of the junction of the roads from Böckweiler and Altheim situated about 2 kilometres north of Altheim, then passing south of Ringweilerhof and north of point 322, rejoining the frontier of France at the angle which it makes about 1 kilometre south of Hornbach (see Map No. 2 scale 1/100,000 annexed to the present Treaty).

"A Commission composed of five members, one appointed by France, one by Germany, and three by the Council of the League of Nations, which will select nationals of other Powers, will be constituted within fifteen days from the coming into force of the present Treaty, to trace on the spot the frontier line described above.

"In those parts of the preceding line which do not coincide with administrative boundaries, the Commission will endeavour to keep to the line indicated, while taking into consideration, so far as is possible, local economic interests and existing communal boundaries.

"The decisions of this Commission will be taken by a majority, and will be binding on the parties concerned.

"Article 49.

"Germany renounces in favour of the League of Nations, in the capacity of trustee, the government of the territory defined above.

"At the end of fifteen years from the coming into force of the present Treaty the inhabitants of the said territory shall be called upon to indicate the sovereignty under which they desire to be placed."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in reference to the last sentence read, while it calls upon the inhabitants of the territory to indicate the sovereignty under which they desire to be placed, there is no provision that they shall be placed where they say they wish to be placed. That seems to me to be a very curious omission in the treaty. With a considerable appearance of magnanimity, the commission appointed by the council, after having exercised sovereignty over the Saar Basin for 15 years, is to call upon the inhabitants to say to what sovereignty they desire to be annexed. Apparently they can pocket the returns and "nothing doing." I suppose it would be sacrilege to offer any amendment to this sacred instrument, and if it were proper it would not be in order at this time, as committee amendments are to be first considered. It seems to me to be a curious omission in the treaty. That is all I have to say about it at the present time.

The Secretary continued the reading, as follows:

"Article 50.

"The stipulations under which the cession of the mines in the Saar Basin shall be carried out, together with the measures intended to guarantee the rights and the well-being of the inhabitant and the government of the territory, as well as the conditions in accordance with which the plebiscite hereinbefore provided for is to be made, are laid down in the Annex hereto. This Annex shall be considered as an integral part of the present Treaty, and Germany declares her adherence to it.

"ANNEX.

"In accordance with the provisions of Articles 45 to 50 of the present Treaty, the stipulations under which the cession by Germany to France of the mines of the Saar Basin will be effected, as well as the measures intended to ensure respect for the rights and well-being of the population and the government of the territory, and the conditions in which the inhabitants will be called upon to indicate the sovereignty under which they may wish to be placed, have been laid down as follows:

"CHAPTER I.

"CESSION AND EXPLOITATION OF MINING PROPERTY.

"1.

"From the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, all the deposits of coal situated within the Saar Basin as defined in Article 48 of the said Treaty, become the complete and absolute property of the French State.

"The French State will have the right of working or not working the said mines, or of transferring to a third party the right of working them, without having to obtain any previous authorisation or to fulfil any formalities.

"The French State may always require that the German mining laws and regulations referred to below shall be applied in order to ensure the determination of its rights.

"The right of ownership of the French State will apply not only to the deposits which are free and for which concessions have not yet been granted, but also to the deposits for which concessions have already been granted, whoever may be the present proprietors, irrespective of whether they belong to the Prussian State, to the Bavarian State, to other States or bodies, to companies or to individuals, whether they have been worked or not, or whether a right of exploitation distinct from the right of the owners of the surface of the soil has or has not been recognized.

"As far as concerns the mines which are being worked, the transfer of the ownership to the French State will apply to all the accessories and subsidiaries of the said mines, in particular to their plant and equipment both on and below the surface, to their extracting machinery, their plants for transforming coal into electric power, coke and by-products, their workshops, means of communication, electric lines, plant for catching and distributing water, land, buildings such as offices, managers', employees' and workmen's dwellings, schools, hospitals and dispensaries, their stocks and supplies of every description, their archives and plans, and in general everything which those who own or exploit the mines possess or enjoy for the purpose of exploiting the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries.

"The transfer will apply also to the debts owing for products delivered before the entry into possession by the French State, and after the signature of the present Treaty, and to deposits of money made by customers, whose rights will be guaranteed by the French State.

"The French State will acquire the property free and clear of all debts and charges. Nevertheless, the rights acquired, or in course of being acquired, by the employees of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, in connection with pensions for old age or disability, will not be affected. In return, Germany must pay over to the French State a sum representing the actuarial amounts to which the said employees are entitled.

"5.

"The value of the property thus ceded to the French State will be determined by the Reparation Commission referred to in Article 233 of Part VIII (Reparation) of the present Treaty.

"This value shall be credited to Germany in part payment of the amount due for reparation.

"It will be for Germany to indemnify the proprietors or parties concerned, whoever they may be.

"6.

"No tariff shall be established on the German railways and canals which may directly or indirectly discriminate to the prejudice of the transport of the personnel or products of the mines and their accessories or subsidiaries, or of the material necessary to their exploitation. Such transport shall enjoy all the rights and privileges which any international railway conventions may guarantee to similar products of French origin.

"7.

"The equipment and personnel necessary to ensure the despatch and transport of the products of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries, as well as the carriage of workmen and employees, will be provided by the local railway administration of the Basin.

"8.

"No obstacle shall be placed in the way of such improvements of railways or waterways as the French State may judge necessary to assure the despatch and the transport of the products of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries, such as double trackage, enlargement of stations, and construction of yards and appurtenances. The distribution of expenses will, in the event of disagreement, be submitted to arbitration.

"The French State may also establish any new means of communication, such as roads, electric lines and telephone connections which it may consider necessary for the exploitation of the mines.

"It may exploit freely and without any restrictions the means of communication of which it may become the owner, particularly those connecting the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries with the means of communication situated in French territory.

"9.

"The French State shall always be entitled to demand the application of the German mining laws and regulations in force on November 11, 1918, excepting provisions adopted exclusively in view of the state of war, with a view to the acquisition of such land as it may judge necessary for the exploitation of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries.

"The payment for damage caused to immovable property by the working of the said mines and their accessories and subsidiaries shall be made in accordance with the German mining laws and regulations above referred to.

"10.

"Every person whom the French State may substitute for itself as regards the whole or part of its rights to the exploitation of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries shall enjoy the benefit of the privileges provided in this Annex.

"11.

"The mines and other immovable property which become the property of the French State may never be made the subject of measures of forfeiture, forced sale, expropriation or requisition, nor of any other measure affecting the right of property.

"The personnel and the plant connected with the exploitation of these mines or their accessories and subsidiaries, as well as the product extracted from the mines or manufactured in their accessories and subsidiaries, may not at any time be made the subject of any measures of requisition.

"12.

"The exploitation of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries, which become the property of the French State, will continue, subject to the provisions of paragraph 23 below, to be subject to the régime established by the German laws and regulations in force on November 11, 1918, excepting provisions adopted exclusively in view of the state of war.

"The rights of the workmen shall similarly be maintained, subject to the provisions of the said paragraph 23, as established on November 11, 1918, by the German laws and regulations above referred to.

"No impediment shall be placed in the way of the introduction or employment in the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries of workmen from without the Basin.

"The employees and workmen of French nationality shall have the right to belong to French labour unions.

"13.

"The amount contributed by the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries, either to the local budget of the territory of the Saar Basin or to the communal funds, shall be fixed with due regard to the ratio of the value of the mines to the total taxable wealth of the Basin.

"14.

"The French State shall always have the right of establishing and maintaining, as incidental to the mines, primary or technical schools for its employees and their children, and of causing instruction therein to be given in the French language, in accordance with such curriculum and by such teachers as it may select.

"It shall also have the right to establish and maintain hospitals, dispensaries, workmen's houses and gardens and other charitable and social institutions.

"The French State shall enjoy complete liberty with respect to the distribution, dispatch and sale prices of the products of the mines and their accessories and subsidiaries.

"Nevertheless, whatever may be the total product of the mines, the French Government undertakes that the requirements of local consumption for industrial and domestic purposes shall always be satisfied in the proportion existing in 1913 between the amount consumed locally and the total output of the Saar Basin.

"CHAPTER II.

"GOVERNMENT OF THE TERRITORY OF THE SAAR BASIN.

"16.

"The Government of the territory of the Saar Basin shall be entrusted to a Commission representing the League of Nations. This Commission shall sit in the territory of the Saar Basin.

"17.

"The Governing Commission provided for by paragraph 16 shall consist of five members chosen by the Council of the League of Nations, and will include one citizen of France, one native inhabitant of the Saar Basin, not a citizen of France, and three members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany.

"The members of the Governing Commission shall be appointed for one year and may be re-appointed. They can be removed by the Council of the League of Nations, which will provide for their replacement.

"The members of the Governing Commission will be entitled to a salary which will be fixed by the Council of the League of Nations, and charged on the local revenues."

The next amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, on page 77, chapter 2, paragraph 17, line 6, after the name "Germany," to insert "or the United State of America."

Mr. SMOOT. That is one of the amendments of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which it has been agreed should be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). The amendment will be passed over until Friday.

The reading of the treaty was resumed, as follows:

"18.

"The Chairman of the Governing Commission shall be appointed for one year from among the members of the Commission by the Council of the League of Nations and may be reappointed.

"The Chairman will act as the executive of the Commission.

"19.

"Within the territory of the Saar Basin the Governing Commission shall have all the powers of government hitherto belonging to the German Empire, Prussia, or Bavaria, including the appointment and dismissal of officials, and the creation of such administrative and representative bodies as it may deem necessary.

"It shall have full powers to administer and operate the railways, canals and the different public services.

"Its decisions shall be taken by a majority.

"20.

"Germany will place at the disposal of the Governing Commission all official documents and archives under the control of Germany, of any German State, or of any local authority, which relate to the territory of the Saar Basin or to the rights of the inhabitants thereof.

"21.

"It will be the duty of the Governing Commission to ensure, by such means and under such conditions as it may deem suitable, the protection abroad of the interests of the inhabitants of the territory of the Saar Basin.

"22.

"The Governing Commission shall have the full right of user of all property, other than mines, belonging, either in public or in private domain, to the Government of the German Empire, or the Government of any German State, in the territory of the Saar Basin.

"As regards the railways an equitable apportionment of rolling stock shall be made by a mixed Commission on which the Government of the territory of the Saar Basin and the German railways will be represented.

"Persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails coming from or going to the Saar Basin shall enjoy all the rights and privileges relating to transit and transport which are specified in the provisions of Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways) of the present Treaty."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a moment ago the Senator from Utah called attention to one of the amendments which were passed over. I wish to make sure that the amendments proposed by the Senator from New Mexico, to wit, striking out the words "and associated" before the word "powers," and appearing on preceding pages, should be noted in the RECORD as having been read by the Secretary. As the Secretary read, he did not state those proposed committee amendments, I presume on the theory that they had been passed over. I simply wish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to show that they are proposed. The Secretary did read the last amendment, to which the Senator from Utah called attention, but he did not read the previous ones—for instance, those on page 61, amendments numbered 4 and 5, where the words "and associated" are proposed to be stricken out. I simply want the amendments to appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as having been read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is entirely correct, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The RECORD will show that the amendments have been read and passed over until Friday.

The reading of the treaty was resumed, as follows:

"23.

"The laws and regulations in force on November 11, 1918, in the territory of the Saar Basin (except those enacted in consequence of the state of war) shall continue to apply.

"If, for general reasons or to bring these laws and regulations into accord with the provisions of the present Treaty, it is necessary to introduce modifications, these shall be decided on, and put into effect by the Governing Commission, after consultation with the elected representatives of the inhabitants in such a manner as the Commission may determine.

"No modification may be made in the legal régime for the exploitation of the mines, provided for in paragraph 12, without the French State being previously consulted, unless such modification results from a general regulation respecting labour adopted by the League of Nations.

"In fixing the conditions and hours of labour for men, women and children, the Governing Commission is to take into consideration the wishes expressed by the local labour organisations, as well as the principles adopted by the League of Nations.

"Subject to the provisions of paragraph 4, no rights of the inhabitants of the Saar Basin acquired or in process of acquisition at the date of the coming into force of this Treaty, in respect of any insurance system of Germany or in respect of any pension of any kind, are affected by any of the provisions of the present Treaty.

"Germany and the Government of the territory of the Saar Basin will preserve and continue all of the aforesaid rights.

"25.

"The civil and criminal courts existing in the territory of the Saar Basin shall continue.

"A civil and criminal court will be established by the Governing Commission to hear appeals from the decisions of the said courts and to decide matters for which these courts are not competent.

"The Governing Commission will be responsible for settling the organisation and jurisdiction of the said court.

"Justice will be rendered in the name of the Governing Commission.

"26.

"The Governing Commission will alone have the power of levying taxes and dues in the territory of Saar Basin.

"These taxes and dues will be exclusively applied to the needs of the territory.

"The fiscal system existing on November 11, 1918, will be maintained as far as possible, and no new tax except customs duties may be imposed without previously consulting the elected representatives of the inhabitants.

"27.

"The present stipulations will not affect the existing nationality of the inhabitants of the territory of the Saar Basin.

"No hindrance shall be placed in the way of those who wish to acquire a different nationality, but in such case the acquisition of the new nationality will involve the loss of any other.

"Under the control of the Governing Commission the inhabitants will retain their local assemblies, their religious liberties, their schools, and their language.

"The right of voting will not be exercised for any assemblies other than the local assemblies, and will belong to every inhabitant over the age of twenty years, without distinction of sex.

"Any of the inhabitants of the Saar Basin who may desire to leave the territory will have full liberty to retain in it their immovable property or to sell it at fair prices, and to remove their movable property free of any charges.

"30.

"There will be no military service, whether compulsory or voluntary, in the territory of the Saar Basin, and the construction of fortifications therein is forbidden.

"Only a local gendarmerie for the maintenance of order may be established.

"It will be the duty of the Governing Commission to provide in all cases for the protection of persons and property in the Saar Basin.

"The territory of the Saar Basin as defined by Article 48 of the present Treaty shall be subjected to the French customs régime. The receipts from the customs duties on goods intended for local consumption shall be included in the budget of the said territory after deduction of all costs of collection.

"No export tax shall be imposed upon metallurgical products or coal exported from the said territory to Germany, nor upon German exports for the use of the industries of the territory of the Saar Basin.

"Natural or manufactured products originating in the Basin in transit over German territory and, similarly, German products in transit over the territory of the Basin shall be free of all customs duties.

"Products which both originate in and pass from the Basin into Germany shall be free of import duties for a period of five years from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, and during the same period articles imported from Germany into the territory of the Basin for local consumption shall likewise be free of import duties.

"During these five years the French Government reserves to itself the right of limiting to the annual average of the quantities imported into Alsace-Lorraine and France in the years 1911 to 1913 the quantities which may be sent into France of all articles coming from the Basin which include raw materials and semi-manufactured goods imported duty free from Germany. Such average shall be determined after reference to all available official information and statistics.

"No prohibition or restriction shall be imposed upon the circulation of French money in the territory of the Saar Basin.

"The French State shall have the right to use French money in all purchases, payments and contracts connected with the exploitation of the mines or their accessories and subsidiaries.

"The Governing Commission shall have power to decide all questions arising from the interpretation of the preceding provisions.

"France and Germany agree that any dispute involving a difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the said provisions shall in the same way be submitted to the Governing Commission, and the decision of a majority of the Commission shall be binding on both countries.

"CHAPTER III.

"PLEBISCITE.

"34.

"At the termination of a period of fifteen years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the population of the territory of the Saar Basin will be called upon to indicate their desires in the following manner:

"A vote will take place by communes or districts, on the three following alternatives: (a) maintenance of the régime established by the present Treaty and by this Annex; (b) union with France; (c) union with Germany.

"All persons without distinction of sex, more than twenty years old at the date of the voting, resident in the territory at the date of the signature of the present Treaty, will have the right to vote.

"The other conditions, methods and the date of the voting shall be fixed by the Council of the League of Nations in such a way as to secure the freedom, secrecy and trustworthiness of the voting.

"The League of Nations shall decide on the sovereignty under which the territory is to be placed, taking into account the wishes of the inhabitants as expressed by the voting:

"(a) If, for the whole or part of the territory, the League of Nations decides in favour of the maintenance of the régime established by the present Treaty and this Annex, Germany hereby agrees to make such renunciation of her sovereignty in favour of the League of Nations as the latter shall deem necessary. It will be the duty of the League of Nations to take appropriate steps to adapt the régime definitely adopted to the permanent welfare of the territory and the general interest;

"(b) If, for the whole or part of the territory, the League of Nations decides in favour of union with France, Germany hereby agrees to cede to France in accordance with the decision of the League of Nations all rights and title over the territory specified by the League;

"(c) If, for the whole or part of the territory, the League of Nations decides in favour of union with Germany, it will be the duty of the League of Nations to cause the German Government to be reestablished in the government of the territory specified by the League.

"36.

"If the League of Nations decides in favour of the union of the whole or part of the territory of the Saar Basin with Germany, France's rights of ownership in the mines situated in such part of the territory will be repurchased by Germany in their entirety at a price payable in gold. The price to be paid will be fixed by three experts, one nominated by Germany, one by France, and one, who shall be neither a Frenchman nor a German, by the Council of the League of Nations; the decision of the experts will be given by a majority.

"The obligation of Germany to make such payment shall be taken into account by the Reparation Commission, and for the purpose of this payment Germany may create a prior charge upon her assets or revenues upon such detailed terms as shall be agreed to by the Reparation Commission.

"If, nevertheless, Germany after a period of one year from the date on which the payment becomes due shall not have effected the said payment, the Reparation Commission shall do so in accordance with such instructions as may be given by the League of Nations, and, if necessary, by liquidating that part of the mines which is in question.

"If, in consequence of the repurchase provided for in paragraph 36, the ownership of the mines or any part of them is transferred to Germany, the French State and French nationals shall have the right to purchase such amount of coal of the Saar Basin as their industrial and domestic needs are found at that time to require. An equitable arrangement regarding amounts of coal, duration of contract, and prices will be fixed in due time by the Council of the League of Nations.

"38.

"It is understood that France and Germany may, by special agreements concluded before the time fixed for the payment of the price for the repurchase of the mines, modify the provisions of paragraphs 36 and 37.

"39.

"The Council of the League of Nations shall make such provisions as may be necessary for the establishment of the régime which is to take effect after the decisions of the League of Nations mentioned in paragraph 35 have become operative, including an equitable apportionment of any obligations of the Government of the territory of the Saar Basin arising from loans raised by the Commission or from other causes.

"From the coming into force of the new régime, the powers of the Governing Commission will terminate, except in the case provided for in paragraph 35 (a).

"In all matters dealt with in the present Annex, the decisions of the Council of the League of Nations will be taken by a majority.

"Section V.

"ALSACE-LORRAINE.

"The HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES, recognising the moral obligation to redress the wrong done by Germany in 1871 both to the rights of France and to the wishes of the population of Alsace and Lorraine, which were separated from their country in spite of the solemn protest of their representatives at the Assembly of Bordeaux,

"Agree upon the following Articles:

"Article 51.

"The territories which were ceded to Germany in accordance with the Preliminaries of Peace signed at Versailles on February 26, 1871, and the Treaty of Frankfort of May 10, 1871, are restored to French sovereignty as from the date of the Armistice of November 11, 1918.

"The provisions of the Treaties establishing the delimitation of the frontiers before 1871 shall be restored.

"Article 52.

"The German Government shall hand over without delay to the French Government all archives, registers, plans, titles and documents of every kind concerning the civil, military, financial, judicial or other administrations of the territories restored to French sovereignty. If any of these documents, archives, registers, titles or plans have been misplaced, they will be restored by the German Government on the demand of the French Government.

"Article 53.

"Separate agreements shall be made between France and Germany dealing with the interests of the inhabitants of the territories referred to in Article 51, particularly as regards their civil rights, their business and the exercise of their professions, it being understood that Germany undertakes as from the present date to recognise and accept the regulations laid down in the Annex hereto regarding the nationality of the inhabitants or natives of the said territories, not to claim at any time or in any place whatsoever as German nationals those who shall have been declared on any ground to be French, to receive all others in her territory, and to conform, as regards the property of German nationals in the territories indicated in Article 51, with the provisions of Article 297 and the Annex to Section IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Those German nationals who without acquiring French nationality shall receive permission from the French Government to reside in the said territories shall not be subjected to the provisions of the said Article.

"Article 54.

"Those persons who have regained French nationality in virtue of paragraph 1 of the Annex hereto will be held to be Alsace-Lorrainers for the purposes of the present Section.

"The persons referred to in paragraph 2 of the said Annex will from the day on which they have claimed French nationality be held to be Alsace-Lorrainers with retroactive effect as from November 11, 1918. For those whose application is rejected, the privilege will terminate at the date of the refusal.

"Such juridical persons will also have the status of Alsace-Lorrainers as shall have been recognised as possessing this quality, whether by the French administrative authorities or by a judicial decision.

"Article 55.

"The territories referred to in Article 51 shall return to France free and quit of all public debts under the conditions laid down in Article 255 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty.

"Article 56.

"In conformity with the provisions of Article 256 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty, France shall enter into possession of all property and estate, within the territories referred to in Article 51, which belong to the German Empire or German States, without any payment or credit on this account to any of the States ceding the territories.

"This provision applies to all movable or immovable property of public or private domain together with all rights whatsoever belonging to the German Empire or German States or to their administrative areas.

"Crown property and the property of the former Emperor or other German sovereigns shall be assimilated to property of the public domain.

"Article 57.

"Germany shall not take any action, either by means of stamping or by any other legal or administrative measures not applying equally to the rest of her territory, which may be to the detriment of the legal value or redeemability of German monetary instruments or monies which, at the date of the signature of the present Treaty, are legally current, and at that date are in the possession of the French Government.

"Article 58.

"A special Convention will determine the conditions for repayment in marks of the exceptional war expenditure advanced during the course of the war by Alsace-Lorraine or by the public bodies in Alsace-Lorraine on account of the Empire in accordance with German law, such as payment to the families of persons mobilised, requisitions, billeting of troops, and assistance to persons who have been evacuated.

"In fixing the amount of these sums Germany shall be credited with that portion which Alsace-Lorraine would have contributed to the Empire to meet the expenses resulting from these payments, this contribution being calculated according to the proportion of the Imperial revenues derived from Alsace-Lorraine in 1913.

"Article 59.

"The French Government will collect for its own account the Imperial taxes, duties and dues of every kind leviable in the territories referred to in Article 51 and not collected at the time of the Armistice of November 11, 1918.

"Article 60.

"The German Government shall without delay restore to Alsace-Lorrainers (individuals, juridical persons and public institutions) all property, rights and interests belonging to them on November 11, 1918, in so far as these are situated in German territory.

"Article 61.

"The German Government undertakes to continue and complete without delay the execution of the financial clauses regarding Alsace-Lorraine contained in the Armistice Conventions.

"Article 62.

"Article 63.

"For the purposes of the obligation assumed by Germany in Part VIII (Reparation) of the present Treaty to give compensation for damages caused to the civil populations of the Allied and Associated countries in the form of fines, the inhabitants

"The administration of this single unit will be carried on by a manager named by the Central Rhine Commission, which shall also have power to remove him.

"All property rights shall be safeguarded. In particular the administration of the ports shall not prejudice any property rights of the French or Baden railroads.

"Equality of treatment as respects traffic shall be assured in both ports to the nationals, vessels and goods of every country.

"Throughout the whole period of any such extension the free zones above provided for shall be maintained.

"Pending appointment of the first manager by the Central Rhine Commission a provisional manager who shall be of French nationality may be appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers subject to the foregoing provisions.

"For all purposes of the present Article the Central Rhine Commission will decide by a majority of votes."

The SECRETARY. In article 65, in the eighth line, on page 103, after the words "principal allied," it is proposed to strike out the words "and associated."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment will go over until Friday.

The reading was continued, as follows:

"Article 66.

"Article 67.

"The French Government is substituted in all the rights of the German Empire over all the railways which were administered by the Imperial railway administration and which are actually working or under construction.

"The same shall apply to the rights of the Empire with regard to railway and tramway concessions within the territories referred to in Article 51.

"This substitution shall not entail any payment of the part of the French State.

"The frontier railway stations shall be established by a subsequent agreement, it being stipulated in advance that on the Rhine frontier they shall be situated on the right bank.

"Article 68.

"In accordance with the provisions of Article 268 of Chapter I of Section I of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, for a period of five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, natural or manufactured products originating in and coming from the territories referred to in Article 51 shall, on importation into German customs territory, be exempt from all customs duty.

"The French Government may fix each year, by decree communicated to the German Government, the nature and amount of the products which shall enjoy this exemption.

"The amount of each product which may be thus sent annually into Germany shall not exceed the average of the amounts sent annually in the years 1911–1913.

"Further, during the period of five years above mentioned, the German Government shall allow the free export from Germany and the free reimportation into Germany, exempt from all customs duties and other charges (including internal charges), of yarns, tissues, and other textile materials or textile products of any kind and in any condition, sent from Germany into the territories referred to in Article 51, to be subjected there to any finishing process, such as bleaching, dyeing, printing, mercerization, gassing, twisting or dressing.

"Article 69.

"During a period of ten years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, central electric supply works situated in German territory and formerly furnishing electic power to the territories referred to in Article 51 or to any establishment the working of which passes permanently or temporarily from Germany to France, shall be required to continue such supply up to the amount of consumption corresponding to the undertakings and contracts current on November 11, 1918.

"Article 71.

"As regards the territories referred to in Article 51, Germany renounces on behalf of herself and her nationals as from November 11, 1918, all rights under the law of May 25, 1910, regarding the trade in potash salts, and generally under any stipulations for the intervention of German organisations in the working of the potash mines. Similarly, she renounces on behalf of herself and her nationals all rights under any agreements, stipulations or laws which may exist to her benefit with regard to other products of the aforesaid territories.

"Article 72.

"The settlement of the questions relating to debts contracted before November 11, 1918, between the German Empire and the German States or their nationals residing in Germany on the one part and Alsace-Lorrainers residing in Alsace-Lorraine on the other part shall be effected in accordance with the provisions of Section III of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present treaty, the expression 'before the war' therein being replaced by the expression 'before November 11, 1918.' The rate of exchange applicable in the case of such settlement shall be the average rate quoted on the Geneva Exchange during the month preceding November 11, 1918.

"There may be established in the territories referred to in Article 51, for the settlement of the aforesaid debts under the conditions laid down in Section III of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, a special clearing office, it being understood that this office shall be regarded as a 'central office' under the provisions of paragraph 1 of the Annex to the said Section.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 23, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Infinite Source of life and light, through whose boundless love we live and move and have our being, strengthen our arm of faith, brighten our star of hope, and fill our souls with high and glorious aspirations; that thus being in touch with Thee, we may walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called and merit at least the well done, good and faithful servant, enter Thou into the joy of Thy Lord; and songs of praises we will ever give to Thee. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. It appears that on September 20 H. R. 9389, a bill to consolidate, codify, revise, and reenact the general and permanent laws of the United States in force March 4, 1919, was introduced by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE]. The bill as printed does not conform either to the rules of the House or to the law, it being printed in fine type, in double columns upon the page, consisting of some 43 pages, 555 sections. I have not had an opportunity to confer with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], but I can not understand why such a measure was printed in such shape, when the law requires bills to be printed in the ordinary bill form, with the lines numbered and of the usual size. If this is intended for a report, of course there can be no objection to it. It does not appear to be a bill, because, while it has a title, it contains no enacting clause. It does, however, upon its title-page contain the note that it will be amended so that it will include all general and permanent laws in force March 4, 1919.

Clearly it would be extremely difficult for the committee or the House to amend such a measure, and, as it relates to revising and reenacting the general and permanent laws of the United States, it is almost certain that amendments will be made either in the committee or by the House. It seems to me that in its present form it is not such a measure as the committee has authority to consider; and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who, I assume, is chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, which is an important committee, should have a reprint made in the usual form, to conform to the law, before consideration of the bill is begun.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, this character of legislation has not been attended to by the House for 45 years, and it is not surprising that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], learned as he is in the methods of the House, is not familiar with it. I presume the last time it was done was probably before the gentleman was born. The last time the statutes of the United States were revised and reenacted was in the Revised Statutes in 1874. We are pursuing the exact method that they pursued at that time. The gentleman states that there is no enacting clause, but if he will turn to the first page of the bill he will find it begins "Be it enacted," just as every other similar law does. It also is the method pursued in every State in the Union in which they have issued such a book. The gentleman will find the enacting clause there. Forty-five years ago the committee introduced just such a bill. The gentleman suggests that it will be amended. This bill will consist, probably, of 10,000 sections and about 1,500 pages or more. If it is amended it will never be passed at all. If I anticipated that it was to be the subject of debate and amendment, I would not ask the House to pass on it, because it would take 18 months to work with it at all. That is the reason that for 45 years the lawyers, the bench, and the litigants of this country have been wholly without any real facilities for finding out what the Federal statutes are. At present, in order to find out what the Federal law is you must read the Revised Statutes of 1874, or their second edition in 1878, which is the same thing in effect, and 23 Public Statutes at Large and 10 Private Statutes at Large. You have to read 34 books. I have from the United States attorneys and the Federal judges of this country a very universal and insistent demand that such a book be printed. There is not any other way to print it. We have introduced it just as it was introduced before, pursuing the same method. This was done after a long conference with the superintendent of work down there as to the best method of doing it, and was adopted at his suggestion. We also conferred with the chairman of the House Committee on Printing. I sent for Mr. Morgan, of the Government Printing Office, and secured his ideas. This bill as introduced here is merely a preliminary step in the nature of a report, as the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests, so that the House will have an opportunity to analyze it and go over it and suggest whatever it has to suggest to the committee. It will require to complete the bill probably a year. The Members will now have that time to examine it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Why was it not printed in the usual form?

Mr. LITTLE. I talked that over with Mr. Morgan, and he said to me that in the last few years there have been thousands of dollars wasted by reports such as the gentleman suggests, and bills and things of that kind printed in the other form, and he suggested that we had a right to print it in this form if it were so desired; that the law, the rules, and the custom would permit it, and it was at his immediate suggestion that I adopted this form. The bill is in bill form.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. GARD. This, I suspect, is merely a sample and a part of what the gentleman will introduce as his bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; it will take about a year to get this bill ready.

Mr. GARD. And is it his purpose finally to introduce a completed bill so that the House may pass on it?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; in about a year.

Mr. GARD. This part in connection with the parts to follow?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. GARD. And the gentleman is adopting this plan merely to advise the House of the first or preliminary steps?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; that is the idea exactly. I am glad the gentleman from Massachusetts brought this up, because it gives me a little opportunity to put it before the House. However, I am not fully prepared to present the matter at this time, but at some time I will ask the House for time to explain it fully so that it may have time to consider it. It will take about a year to get the bill together. Probably we will not introduce any more now, but will have it in shape so that the House can examine it.

I have a letter from the Public Printer in which he states that the printing of the bill in the ordinary form would cost over $34,000, and to print it in this shape, when done, would cost $11,000. The reason we printed it this way is that we will save $23,000; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has done so much along that line that I think he will appreciate that.

If it should be the pleasure of the House and the Senate to pass the legislation when finally presented to them, it will be ready in a shape that will commend itself to the Committee on Printing as the best way to be printed, and will get it into a more compact form. Mr. Morgan states, after he went over it with me for three or four hours, that this is the type of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the pages can be used with less expense than any other method of printing. There will be no change in machinery or type, and it can be run off immediately.

Also, the committee has decided, after reviewing the law back all of these years, that it is the most readable way for a lawyer to get at it, and combines cheapness and compactness for reading purposes and all those requisites. As I say, the superintendent of work said that it would save $23,000 in printing. When we get it done we will have a bill which can be run right off. They will take the type, make the casts from it, and be ready immediately to run off the book. There will be no additional expense to it, and it will save a great many thousand dollars and greatly expedite the work. Form of a bill is a legal matter; refers to legal forms, title, and enacting clause, for example, not to the way a printer sets it up.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, while it may be true that 45 years ago this matter was done in this way, the gentleman from Kansas realizes that sometimes we pass laws in a period of 45 years, and as it happened, we passed one of these laws within the 45 years relative to printing of bills for the consideration by the House of Representatives. We passed a law in 1905, and while we are very glad to have the views of the gentleman down at the Printing Office and to know that he is anxious to cooperate in saving money, yet under the law and the rules of this House this bill is not in proper form to be considered by the House, and until it is in proper form I submit that the committee has no authority to consider it in committee; because when a bill is introduced the law provides how it shall be prepared and introduced. I appreciate that the saving in printing the bill is considerable, but the House can not consider this bill in its present shape with any expedition. The lines are not numbered. If an amendment were to be offered, it would be confusing in view of the general practice which has been followed in the House, and under the rules of the House, to attempt to perfect a bill, or even correct errors that might appear in it.

It would seem to me that before the House can proceed to consider this bill it will have to be printed in the usual bill form. I submit to gentlemen that it would be better, even as important as this subject is, that it be printed in the usual way. I simply bring this to the attention of the House and to the Speaker. I am glad the gentleman from Kansas was present. I can appreciate that this measure in this form is in excellent form for the report from a committee, but it is not in the form for consideration by the committee and by the House. I submit that in this form the committee is without jurisdiction to proceed and consider it.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the gentleman's suggestion that it ought to be printed in the other form for the House to take up and consider it, I will suggest that if the House proposes to consider this bill in the manner suggested the committee will quit right here. It can not be done. For 45 years committees have been shying away from the job, taking up a little now and then, but not getting anywhere. The bill of 1874 went through the United States Senate in 40 minutes. Mr. Roscoe Conkling was the chairman of the committee; he was asked if there were any mistakes in it, and he said possibly there were mistakes as there were mistakes in all things human, but if they undertook to discuss it they would never pass it. Up to that time there had been no general code of the United States. The only way to get the bill through is to have no discussion of the character which the gentleman mentions and no amendments. It would take more than two years, the whole life of a Congress, to consider it after such fashion in either branch. It is impossible. The only method that is possible at all is to take the method that was adopted before, and that is for the House to follow the method that was pursued 45 years ago. I have a long list of letters from United States attorneys and Federal judges insisting that this legislation be enacted.

Judge Hough, for example, of the Circuit Court of New York City, conceded, I believe, the equal of any lawyer who has had any practice in the Federal courts, says this is the way of getting at this, and that is to present this bill now, to present it to the House from time to time and give the membership of the House an opportunity to do what the gentleman from Massachusetts has now, of making any suggestion, and any suggestion which anyone desires to make the committee will be glad to have. We will make any correction of anything to which attention is called, in the years during which we will be at work upon it, and our hope is by that time the House shall know enough about it so that it will feel disposed to do what it did 45 years ago, when Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts, a very learned lawyer, perhaps as good as Massachusetts has produced—and the gentleman coming from Massachusetts knows what an able lawyer Gen. Butler was—presented it to the House. When they had up the bill under consideration he described it as a codification of the laws of the United States. The House did lose some time in preliminary work then, but finally passed it when it got ready in a very short time without any general discussion. It then went to the Senate and they passed it in about 40 minutes. They had great lawyers over there, Morton, Conkling, Edmunds were on the committee; ex-Senator Poland, of Vermont, was chairman of the committee of this House when it finally went through; Butler was chairman when it was prepared. Those people finally decided that there was only one way of getting this kind of a bill passed to get a general code of the United States. We could have waited until the last minute and could have thrown it in here in great bulk, but we thought it was fair to the House and the lawyers of the country to take the preliminary step now. This bill does not violate any law I know of——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is chairman of the great Committee on Revision of the Laws, and he certainly holding that position——

Mr. LITTLE. This is entirely within the spirit and purpose of the law.

Mr. WALSH (continuing). Ought to know that in 1905 we did pass a law saying how bills should be printed before they could be considered by the House.

Mr. LITTLE. I feel this is entirely within the spirit and purpose of that law.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, we are very glad to know that there is one committee of our distinguished body that says unless they can have their own way they will quit; in other words, they are above the law. We are also glad to know that the House of Representatives has a matter pending before it or about to be pending before it that must be passed without amendment or reservation. The coordinate branch, I believe, is wrestling with a similar document or a similar problem which it is insisted must be passed without reservation or amendment. Now, if this codification of the laws must come before this House and be passed witnout amendment or change it would seem to me, if that is the attitude of the committee, that it must be done that way; that unless it can be considered in accordance with the rules of the House and the law that possibly public interest might not suffer if the committee did quit. But I submit, sir, that there is nothing affecting this problem of revising and codifying the laws that takes it out of the general rules and customs. Therefore I make the point of order, to bring the matter to a head, that the bill, H. R. 9389, as introduced and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, is not in proper form and therefore the committee has no jurisdiction to consider it.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has not quoted me fairly. I did not say the committee was going to quit because it could not have its own way. What I said was that to follow the system the gentleman suggested would make it impossible to complete the text in two years or in two Congresses; that for any Congress to take this up and consider it in the way he suggests is quite impossible. In the course of nature and in the experience of the bar, and of the Congress, it could not take this up in the method he suggests and ever get it finished. If the gentleman wants to lay the burden and expense upon this committee of going through all this work when we have the experience of a hundred years, why the gentleman can make his point of order, if there is such a point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Before the gentleman leaves that point.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If I understand the gentleman, he contends that to print this with numbered lines would make a great many more pages, and that because of the number of pages and volume of the work the committee would not be able to complete its consideration, whereas if it is printed in this form they could go through it expeditiously?

Mr. LITTLE. No. The point I had in mind was—the gentleman's statement is all right as far as it goes—if it was printed in the form he suggests, it would cost a vast amount of money and make a tremendous book. As soon as the consideration is terminated, it would be destroyed and thrown aside; it would have to be; and the expense would be tremendous. That suggestion I got from the superintendent of work. If we should undertake to take this up section by section and handle it in the way the gentleman suggests, we would never get done in the world.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the matter of consideration by the House is a matter that could be determined later, and that probably would be considered under a special rule. But does not the gentleman think it ought to be in the usual shape?

Mr. LITTLE. It ought to be, but we can not do it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that the technical point made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct. The law specifically provides that all legislation shall be first printed in bill form, which the Chair understands is in the form which we have always used, printed with lines numbered, and this obviously does not conform to that practice. Therefore the Chair at first blush would think that it does not conform to the law. Neither does it seem to conform to the law in the enacting clause. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] states strong reasons for his action, but it seems to the Chair that that would have to be done by a joint resolution.

Mr. LITTLE. I think, Mr. Speaker, we are following the spirit and the purpose of the law, myself.

The SPEAKER. It may be that the spirit and the purpose of the law is economy, but the law specifically provides that all bills and resolutions shall be printed in bill form. The Chair does not see how this conforms to that provision.

Mr. LITTLE. I will make this request, then, that the gentleman from Massachusetts will withhold for the present his point of order. I think an examination will demonstrate that our position is correct.

Mr. WALSH. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Revision of the Laws may consider the bill H. R. 9389 in its present form.

Mr. WALSH. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] reserve the point of order?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The SPEAKER. By a special order of the House to-day the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has leave to address the House for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is to discuss an important subject, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. COOPER. I would prefer that the gentleman would not do so, because I do not want to take up 30 minutes of the time of the House in calling the roll.

Mr. LANKFORD. I withdraw the point if the gentleman requests it.

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD. All right.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, during the month of August, 1914, there was a message flashed across the Atlantic Ocean to the American people that all of the great nations of Europe were at war. To our people it was like a bolt of lightning coming from a clear sky. But, nevertheless, it was true, and from that day on and until more than four years thereafter there raged in Europe the most terrible, bloody, and inhuman struggle that has ever been recorded in the history of the world. Countries were torn asunder by shot and shell, homes were destroyed, churches and cathedrals demolished, and the lifeblood of millions of young men of our own and of the European nations was shed upon the battle field.

When we received that fateful message little did we think that the day would come when we would be called upon to take a part in that gigantic struggle. We steadfastly did all in our power to preserve peace. For three years we suffered insult after insult. Our ships were destroyed upon the high seas, our citizens—men, defenseless women, and young children—were murdered in cold blood. But the time came when our patience ceased to be a virtue, and we decided to strike back at this despotic monster that was eating at the very heartstrings of civilization and undermining the foundations of Christianity.

It would be sacrilegious for me to say that Almighty God decreed that that great war should take place, but I do believe that at that critical hour, in 1917, when it seemed as if civilization was lost, when it seemd as if the church and the religion of Jesus Christ was tottering and falling, aye, when it seemed as if the whole world was soaked and drenched in human blood—I do believe that at that critical hour God Almighty called upon us as a Christian Nation and people to draw the sword and strike.

It is not my intention to try to tell you what part we had in the war, only to say that when we did go into the struggle our Nation, young and strong, rich in man power, money, and resources, threw her whole heart and soul into that fight. [Applause.] And our soldier boys, God bless them, our boys, who hesitated not when the war came, were ready to sacrifice their all in order that Christian civilization and righteousness might be saved.

Nowhere in the history of the world can be found a more glorious achievement than that which crowned the American soldier at Chateau Thierry, St. Mihiel, and the Argonne Forest. We all thank God that the war is over and that autocracy never again shall come to the nations of the earth to kill and devastate, and we feel proud of the part we had in this great fight for a Christian civilization and for righteousness.

But, my fellow Members, I trust we will not forget that the work is not done yet. To-day we face the great problems of reconstruction. It was not to be expected that at the end of four years of awful war and bloodshed, which brought so much sorrow and misery and suffering to the world, that we could immediately adjust ourselves to normal peace-time conditions again.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I speak seriously, and I measure well my words when I say that I believe that we as a Nation to-day face more serious questions and more difficult problems than we did at any time during the war period.

The great question we face at this hour is not fighting for our lives and institutions against a foreign foe. The great problem which confronts us at this time is how are we going to get back to normal conditions again and bring back to our people that feeling of content and happiness we have enjoyed in the past in this country. [Applause.]

All over our land to-day we see and hear of the feeling of unrest. Discontent and dissatisfaction seem to be prevalent wherever we go. As we read our newspapers we get reports of the very disturbed conditions among the working classes employed in our industries and mines. We read of strike after strike, until it seems as if our wheels of industry have stopped. We read of some members of labor organizations who refuse to obey the mandates of their officials and defy their orders and strike after their officers have ordered them not to cease work. One of the best evidences of this condition is that in the last two or three months the officials of some of our railroad brotherhoods have expelled many men from their organizations for disobeying official orders.

I am one of those who believe that many of our great labor leaders are loyal American citizens who are interested not only in the welfare of the members of their own organizations but also in the welfare of all the people of our Nation. But I do not hesitate to say that it appears as if these conservative labor leaders may be pushed aside in order to let a more radical element take their places. I have the highest respect for Mr. Samuel Gompers, and the work he did during the war, and his efforts to maintain the American Federation of Labor as a conservative force. I believe he did all in his power to at least delay this steel strike. But I speak for a few minutes to-day to try to warn the American laboring man not to be led astray by these radical, so-called labor leaders, who would overthrow our form of Government and destroy the sacred institutions which in the past have been near and dear to the hearts of the American people. [Applause.]

There was started on Monday throughout all of the great steel industries of our country what is probably the greatest and the most serious strike that the American people have ever experienced, and if press reports are true, many of the plants of this great industry are closed to-day, and something like 284,000 men have ceased work.

Outside the Pittsburgh district the Mahoning Valley district of Ohio, which I have the honor to represent in Congress, is the largest steel district in the country. Therefore, as the representative of this district I am very much concerned about the situation, as is every good citizen of the community. We all wish this great strike could have been avoided. And how I wish that Mr. Gary, the head of the United States Steel Corporation, could have met his men and considered this great question. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I fully realize what it may mean to me, coming from our great industrial district, to speak on this vital question, and possibly what I say here to-day may be misconstrued. In the limited time that I have I can not go into the important issues pending between the management of the steel industries and their employees. Most of the Members of Congress know what these issues are. I have now and always have had a warm feeling in my heart for the working classes, and I stand ready to assist them at any time in efforts to better their conditions. I believe in the eight-hour day, and I also believe that the time has come when men who work with their hands should have a fairer portion of the profits that industry earns. I further believe in the right of collective bargaining, and I trust that the day will soon come when there will be closer, more friendly cooperation between managers and men. From my own personal experience I think I know the feeling of the great army of employees who work by the hour and the day in the industries of our country.

But I want to solemnly warn the workers that at this time there are many agitators who are pushing themselves to places of prominence and leadership. Many of these men have not done an honest day's work in their lives [applause], and if reports are true they are stirring up a class hatred which will widen the gap between employer and employee instead of bringing them closer together.

I believe that our country needs a revival of that good old-time American spirit, and that we should not pay so much attention to foreign sentiment. [Applause.] If newspaper accounts are true, especially those contained in this morning's Washington Post, these agitators are a menacing danger. The fact was brought to my attention last week in my district that these agitators, when they held their meetings, threatened these foreign-born people and told them if they went out to work next Monday they would burn their homes down and kill their children.

These extremists are appealing especially to men of foreign birth who have little or no conception of American ideals and institutions, and it is to one of these men that I want to call the attention of Congress and the country. I hold here in my hand a book or a pamphlet entitled "Syndicalism." One of the authors and publishers of this book is a man named William Z. Foster. You have seen his name in the papers quite frequently in the last two or three weeks. I want you to know who William Z. Foster is. At the present time he is secretary-treasurer of the national committee which has had charge of organizing the steel workers throughout the country. I charge that Mr. Foster's own words in this book show his unfitness as a labor leader. [Applause.] They disqualify him from the name of an American citizen and the protection of that flag. [Applause.] I want to quote some of the things that Mr. Foster says and believes in. In his book on syndicalism, in referring to a general strike, he says:

> In his choice of weapons to fight his capitalist enemies the syndicalist is no more careful to select those that are "fair," "just," or "civilized" than is a householder attacked in the night by a burglar. He knows he is engaged in a life and death struggle with an absolutely lawless and unscrupulous enemy, and considers his tactics only from the standpoint of their effectiveness. With him the end justifies the means. Whether his tactics be "legal" and "moral" or not does not concern him, so long as they are effective. He knows that the laws, as well as the current code of morals, are made by his mortal enemies, and considers himself about as much bound by them as a householder would himself by regulations regarding burglary adopted by an association of housebreakers. Consequently he ignores them (the laws and the current code of morals) in so far as he is able and it suits his purpose. He proposes to develop, regardless of capitalist conceptions of "legality," "fairness," "right," etc., a greater power than his capitalist enemies have, and then to wrest from them by force the industries they have stolen from him by force and duplicity and so to put an end forever to the wages system. He proposes to bring about the revolution by the general strike.

Again, touching on the general strike and referring to armed forces, he says:

Once the general strike is in active operation, the greatest obstacle to its success will be the armed forces of capitalism—soldiers, police, detectives, etc. This formidable force will be used energetically by the capitalists to break the general strike. The syndicalists have given much study to the problem presented by this force and have found the solution for it. Their proposed tactics are very different from those used by rebels in former revolutions. They are not going to mass themselves and allow themselves to be slaughtered by capital's trained murderers in the orthodox way. Theirs is a safer, more effective, and more modern method. They are going to defeat the armed forces by disorganizing and demoralizing them.

Oh, men, it seems to me these words in some respects are coming home to us now. [Applause.]

Again he says:

Syndicalists in every country are already actively preparing this disorganization of the armed forces by carrying on a double educational campaign amongst the workers. On the one hand, they are destroying their illusions about the sacredness of capitalist property and encouraging them to seize this property wherever they have the opportunity. On the other, they are teaching working class soldiers not to shoot their brothers and sisters who are in revolt, but, if need be, to shoot their own officers and to desert the Army when the crucial moment arrives. This double propaganda of contempt for capitalist property "rights," and antimilitarism, are inseparable from the propaganda of the general strike.

Here is what he says about bloodshed:

Another favorite objection of ultralegal and peaceful socialists is that the general strike would cause bloodshed.

This is probably true, as every great strike is accompanied by violence. Every forward pace humanity has taken has been gained at the cost of untold suffering and loss of life, and the accomplishment of the revolution will probably be no exception. But the prospect of bloodshed does not frighten the syndicalist worker, as it does the parlor socialist. He is too much accustomed to risking himself in the murderous industries and on the hellish battle fields in the niggardly service of his masters—to set much value on his life. He will gladly risk it once, if necessary, in his own behalf. He has no sentimental regards for what may happen to his enemies during the general strike. He leaves them to worry over that detail.

Again Mr. Foster said:

The syndicalist is as "unscrupulous" in his choice of weapons to fight his every-day battles as for his final struggle with capitalism. He allows no considerations of "legality," "religion," "patriotism," "honor," "duty," etc., to stand in the way of his adoption of effective tactics. The only sentiment he knows is loyalty to the interests of the working class. He is in utter revolt against capitalism in all its phases. His lawless course often lands him in jail, but he is so fired by revolutionary enthusiasm that jails, or even death, have no terrors for him. He glories in martyrdom, consoling himself with the knowledge that he is a terror to his enemies, and that his movement, to-day sending chills along the spine of international capitalism, to-morrow will put an end to this monstrosity.

Now, friends, listen to this, and I will read only one more quotation from his book:

The syndicalist is a radical antipatriot. He is a true internationalist, knowing no country. He opposes patriotism, because it creates feeling of nationalism among the workers of the various countries and prevents cooperation between them, and, also, because of the militarism it inevitably breeds.

Ah, my friends, those are some of the teachings that Mr. William Z. Foster has been preaching to the workingmen of this country.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER. I would rather the gentleman would not interrupt me just now. I have only 10 minutes more.

I also have here a copy of the Labor World, a paper which is published in Pittsburgh and is devoted to the interests of the working classes. In it are reproduced photographic proof of Foster's I. W. W.ism. Foster was one of the writers for the paper Solidarity, the eastern organ of the I. W. W. Here are photographic copies of his signatures, "Yours for the I. W. W., William Z. Foster"; "Yours for the revolution, William Z. Foster." This paper was published in New Castle, Pa., only a few miles from my home in Youngstown, Ohio.

Mr. Speaker, can it be possible that in this critical time of our Nation's history such men as William Z. Foster are spokesmen for the working classes of the country?

I appeal to the workingmen to wake up and not be led astray by such agitators as this man is. [Applause.] And I am wondering why the American Federation of Labor, most of whose members are honest, law-abiding citizens, permits such a man as Foster to take such a prominent part in organizing the steel workers when the federation itself has officially condemned him for the revolutionary agitator that he is. [Applause.]

I have in my possession the report of the thirty-first annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, held in Atlanta, Ga., November 13, 1911. In the proceedings of this convention appears the report of James Duncan, then and now vice president of the American Federation of Labor, the chief delegate of the federation at the international labor conference held in Budapest, Hungary, earlier in that year. A large part of Mr. Duncan's report consisted in a most illuminating statement of the activities of Foster as an American I. W. W. representative in Europe at that time. It appears that Foster was a bitter enemy of the Federation of Labor at that time. Mr. Duncan said in part:

The French delegation interposed an inquiry, which after some informal discussion was formally and definitely offered in substance, as follows: "Can a delegate to this meeting be required to answer a question as to whether he belongs to any political or civic organization outside of the trade center he represents."

As the discussion progressed, I discovered that the inquiry, in a veiled manner, was directed against my credentials as representing organized labor of North America. A misguided man named Foster, from Chicago, Ill., claiming to represent an alleged organization of labor in America, called the International Workers of the World, had been for some time in Paris, and had succeeded in convincing the French delegates that he represented a labor organization in America, and was entitled to be recognized by the secretariat, instead of the American Federation of Labor.

During the discussion on the motion misguided Foster lost control of his temper and gave the convention ocular demonstration of what an I. W. W. really is. His language was foul, vulgar, and vehement. He even threatened assault, and subsided only to prevent expulsion from the room. He spoke in English, and I had his language interpreted to the delegates, but his actions were equally detrimental to the purpose he had in mind, as was the interpretation. The Frenchmen were not dismayed at their tricolor being smudged with I. W. W. mire. They suggested that if the Foster aggregation were not admitted that the American Federation of Labor should be kept out of the international secretariat until both organizations became reconciled to a uniform policy.

After general discussion Foster was given an opportunity to tell his own story in his own way. * * * He claimed that in America the I. W. W. was the only body that organized unskilled workers; that 85 per cent of their skilled members were also in the American Federation of Labor unions; that those unions would not admit Socialists and revolutionary foreigners into membership; that the people he represented were 100 per cent Socialists and revolutionists, who were preparing for the international strike, which would strike terror into the hearts of capitalism, including the American Federation of Labor. The climax in his harangue was that he understood that other trade-union officials and I had been known to sit and eat at the same table with a President of the United States, with Bishop Potter, and with Archbishop Corrigan, of New York, and that, therefore, we were not qualified to represent the working class.

Again, after Mr. Duncan had read the portion of the report in reference to Mr. Foster he said:

During the proceedings a letter received by this man from Chicago was passed around among the delegates. As only a few of the delegates could read the letter, which was in English, I had it interpreted for the others. The letter is as follows:

INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD,
518 CAMBRIDGE BUILDING,
Chicago, Ill., July 21, 1911.

VINCENT ST. JOHN,
General Secretary-Treasurer.
W. E. TRAUTMAN,
Assistant Secretary and General Organizer.

Mr. W. Z. FOSTER,
Care Mr. Fritz Kater,
C–54 Alte Schonhausen Strasse 20, Berlin, Germany.

FELLOW WORKER: Am mailing you by registered mail this date, general delivery, Budapest, Hungary, dope that we have on hand to date. If we are successful in getting additional dope, will send it on as fast as we get hold of it.

If suggestions are in order and this letter reaches you in time, I would suggest that you get into Budapest as early as possible, look up Basch, and hold down the town. Basch may also have some dope that will be of assistance to you.

Have had documents marked so as to help you out in getting at the matter, without having to search through the papers. The bound volume of Socialist Review has index marked. Try and take good care of all these documents, as they will come in handy in the future, no doubt.

With best wishes, I am,
Yours for industrial freedom,
(Signed) VINCENT ST. JOHN,
General Secretary.

He was the general secretary of the Industrial Workers of the World.

I read further from the report:

Vice President DUNCAN. All I have to say in addition to the letter is that I am somewhat fearful the "dope" had effect, because soon after the fracas to which I have referred in my official report took place Mr. Foster came to grief in Budapest. The following day a Hungarian, who had been in this country and could speak some English, came to me and said a subscription was being passed around to get Foster out of jail and enable him to return to Berlin. He had been arrested the night before because of some trouble he had with a street-car conductor for not paying his fare. I told my friend that since the Roman occupation of that part of the country the roads had been in excellent condition, that pedestrianism was good for the health, and I would therefore refrain from interfering with Mr. Foster's opportunity to benefit his health by walking back to Berlin.

My friends, I have read the report of James Duncan, the first vice president of the American Federation of Labor, as to Mr. Foster and his Industrial Workers of the World activities and Bolsheviki attitude at Budapest, Hungary. I am wondering why the great American Federation of Labor, which, I believe, has the interest of the working classes at heart, should allow this man to now take a prominent part as secretary-treasurer of a great committee that has been organizing the steel workers in our country.

In conclusion, I would raise my voice most strongly against those who talk so freely about revolution in this country. [Applause.] Let the agitators and those whom they may mislead remember that in the United States of America every man has a vote, and before long every woman will have one. [Applause.] The citizens of this country have it in their power to determine who shall make and execute our laws. Under such conditions it is insane to talk about a revolution by violence and riot, and those who suggest it should be dealt with as enemies and traitors to society. [Applause.]

Government by the majority is not to the liking of the agitators, who think they see in the popular dissatisfaction against conditions a chance for a short cut to power and loot. This element would be glad to see our police and then our soldiers alienated from their sworn duty. Then would come their opportunity to fall upon a defenseless populace, and then they think they could get control of government. It was only when the soldiers deserted their Government that the French Revolution and its orgy of terror became possible, and it was only when Kerensky failed to maintain the discipline and loyalty of the Russian Army that the Bolshevists came into power. We all only have to recall what happened in Boston a few days ago to know what always takes place when the forces of law and order give way.

Of course our Government and our country is not perfect, for it is composed of human beings. But I am firm in my belief that it is the best Government and the best country in the world to-day [applause]; that the poor man, the workingman, has more freedom and greater privileges and opportunities here than in any other country on the face of the earth. [Applause.] Let those bloody agitators, anarchists, Bolshevists, and syndicalists point to some other land which is freer and fairer than ours, and then if they think there is such a country let them rid us of their presence and retire to that Utopia. [Applause.] I still agree with the immortal Lincoln that this is a "Government of the people, by the people, for the people," and that it "will not perish from the earth." [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1479. An act for the relief of the estate of Moses M. Bane;

631. An act repealing certain provisions contained in the urgent deficiency act approved December 22, 1911;

S. 2259. An act for the relief of Edward S. Farrow;

S. 861. An act for the relief of Edward W. Whitaker;

S. 2497. An act to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct;

S. 3016. An act to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 79. Joint resolution exempting the Dixie Highway from the prohibition contained in the act approved July 11, 1919.

CAMP A. A. HUMPHREYS, VA.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 208, making an appropriation for Camp Humphreys, Va.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 208, authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to expend the following sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., for the completion of bungalow quarters, now partially constructed, including gravel roads, walks, sidewalks, sewers, electric-light lines, heating, water lines, painting, clearing, brushing, grading, sodding, and alteration of existing buildings and miscellaneous incidental construction incident thereto, $116,000.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to expend from sums already appropriated for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1920, such maintenance and repair funds as may be necessary for maintenance and repair work, storage of material, and clearing up débris at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, what is the urgency for the present consideration of this measure?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say that the Military Committee asked me to secure, if possible, the consideration of this resolution at this time because of the urgent necessity for the appropriation of this money to enable the officers and men on duty at Camp Humphreys to go into winter quarters properly protected and properly housed. There are a number of incomplete bungalows there in various stages of completion—from 10 to 90 per cent. The principal need is to finish the structures which will house 100 officers and families and enable the continuance of the engineer school at that camp during the winter. Otherwise they will be forced to abandon the school. The amount has been cut down from $580,000 to $116,000.

Mr. WALSH. Was not this carried in the military appropriation bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. It was not. The House by restrictive action cut off all expenditure of money at Army camps and cantonments. The War Department asked for $580,000, but after investigation by the Committee on Military Affairs it was found that $116,000 will permit them to go through the winter.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is this the same bill that was before the House a few days ago?

Mr. ANTHONY. This is the same bill that was called up under the Unanimous Consent Calendar and objected to. But the matter is so urgent that the committee would like to get it through as soon as possible.

Mr. CANNON. This is the camp for which they asked over half a million dollars, which sum the committee has now cut down to more than $100,000 to complete officers' quarters so that they can get over the winter?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the idea.

Mr. CANNON. That means, if it means anything—and I hope the gentleman, if he can, will disabuse my mind—that this is to be an engineer school in perpetuity.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Committee on Military Affairs believes that the engineers should have the advantage of summer field operations on this Camp Humphreys tract; but I believe it undoubtedly to be the sentiment of our committee that under no circumstances will we ever recommend the appropriation of a dollar for the creation of a permanent engineer school at Camp Humphreys. It is simply a business proposition. Here are about 70 buildings. On the average they are, I would say, about 80 per cent complete. If we do not complete them they will be very badly damaged this winter, deterioration will set in, and if completed they will be a valuable asset to the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Did the committee consider the proposition that the officers' quarters down here on the Potomac that were formerly occupied might perhaps be restored to their former use?

Mr. ANTHONY. We hope so.

Mr. CANNON. We could do it by an act of Congress, could we not, or by a joint resolution? If I recollect rightly, the action of the powers that be was condemned when they were driven out of those quarters.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that the War Department has moved an immense amount of heavy machinery from the site of Washington Barracks out to Camp Humphreys, in the hope that the permanent school would be there. The school is now using that machinery, and an enormous amount of it. It can not be moved back this winter in time for the students to utilize it, and if we do not let them go ahead there, at least this winter, with the plant which they have installed without securing the approval of Congress, they will have no engineer school.

Mr. CANNON. How far is it from the city down to this camp?

Mr. ANTHONY. About 20 miles.

Mr. CANNON. And the railroads run down near to it?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think within about 3 or 5 miles, but the Government has constructed a branch railroad into the camp. There is a very fine macadamized highway to Washington.

Mr. CANNON. So that there is good transportation. Did the committee consider how much it would cost the Government in a good apartment house or at a hotel to pay the expenses of the families of these officers?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it would be almost impossible at this time to make provision for the housing of the officers and their families which now occupy these quarters at Washington Barracks. There is no available room in Washington, as the gentleman knows, that can be secured at this time. We can, however, construct suitable apartment quarters for these families, if given another year in which to do it., which will take care of the officers stationed at the War College, and we hope to have the entire plant of the engineer school back at Washington Barracks by another year.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman submit to an amendment to this joint resolution which he asks unanimous consent to now consider, that the school shall be transferred back to the former quarters?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that it would meet with my hearty approval, if it would be possible to put such an amendment on.

Mr. CANNON. It can be done by unanimous consent, if the gentleman will offer the amendment that he speaks of now as part of this joint resolution. If he does so, I should not be inclined to object to its consideration, although to pay over $100,000 for officers' temporary quarters for three months upon a reservation that is to be abandoned seems to me to be poor business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would say to the gentleman that it is not contemplated that the Humphreys reservation be abandoned. It will be retained for field operations and engineer training in the field.

Mr. CANNON. How many acres are there down there?

Mr. ANTHONY. About 6,000.

Mr. CANNON. Only 6,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. The Government owns it all, and it is admirably adapted for this purpose. Before the war the Government owned the Belvoir Peninsula there, containing about 1,600 acres, to which the Engineer Corps used to resort for this field training.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman prepare and offer such an amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would be very glad to do that, or I would yield to the gentleman from Illinois for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. I am not on the Military Committee, and what I do not know about military would make a library.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be amended——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Unanimous consent has not yet been given for its consideration, has it?

The SPEAKER. That must first be granted.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman give the House opportunity to consider the amendment? I wish the gentleman would read the proposed amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. The proposed amendment that the gentleman from Illinois suggests should read about as follows:

At the end of bill add the following:
"Provided, That the engineer school shall be returned to its former location at Washington Barracks at the first available opportunity."

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; fix a time.

Mr. BUTLER. That might mean a thousand years.

Mr. ANTHONY. At the earliest practical time.

Mr. CANNON. The 1st of June next.

Mr. ANTHONY. Before the end of the present fiscal year, if that will satisfy the gentleman. It would take about that time to bring about the changes necessary.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman submit the matter for unanimous consent, with that amendment which he has just repeated to be a part of the joint resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will submit the amendment by unanimous consent as soon as we get unanimous consent for consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the proposed measure what is the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs, or those who have charge of this reservation, concerning the bill in a larger amount for some permanent improvement for Camp Humphreys which is pending on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

Mr. ANTHONY. The subcommittee to which it was referred cut the amount from $580,000 provided in the bill to which the gentleman from Ohio refers down to $116,000, as provided in this resolution, which we deem will amply take care of the existing partially completed construction.

Mr. GARD. The other bill was on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent and is still before the House——

Mr. ANTHONY. And was objected to.

Mr. GARD. It is still pending for disposition. What is to be done with that?

Mr. ANTHONY. I presume that will die a natural death if this resolution be passed.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman take some action so that the bill be not brought forward but lie upon the table?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I suggest at the conclusion of the consideration of this resolution that the gentleman ask that that bill lie upon the table.

Mr. GARD. It should if this bill is considered. But if the Committee on Military Affairs says that this amount is sufficient, the other bill should not come before the House or any committee of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. GARD. With that understanding, I shall not object.

Mr. CANNON. With the understanding also——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask a further question. Do I understand it is not the purpose of making a permanent engineer school at Camp Humphreys?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is emphatically not. I would not appropriate a five-cent piece to build a permanent school there.

Mr. WALSH. Then the buildings that are to be completed will have to be scrapped eventually?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. They will be utilized for the same purpose they are now being utilized for, as quarters during these summer training periods. The school will be moved there during the summer for field practice, summer training, the digging of trenches, the operation of pontoons, the construction of mines, field entanglements, defenses, and so forth. It means Camp Humphreys will be the summer quarters of the engineer school, and they can occupy it with the buildings they have now if we let them complete these officers' quarters, which are nearly finished. It means the winter quarters will be moved back in the winter to Washington Barracks.

Mr. WALSH. How many are they going to have at this school?

Mr. ANTHONY. They propose to have 200 students there this winter. There are about 110 there now. There are a little over 100 married officers who have to be accommodated there or we have to provide commutation for quarters for them here in Washington. This will make an amount greater than the interest on this $116,000 by far.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, in view of the information which is not contained in the report but which has been given by the gentleman from Kansas and because he has expressed the sentiment that he would be willing to have this properly restricted, I shall not object, but it does not seem to me that this is the proper way to take up appropriations for military purposes by unanimous consent. I have no objection.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to reserve the right to object to ask a question. I would like to know if this proposition is part of the Secretary of War's scheme for an army of 576,000 men?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think so. The instruction of our engineer officers has always been a permanent part of the education of our Army, and undoubtedly will be required to an even greater extent in the next few years because of the fact particularly that we have graduated two classes from West Point of half-baked officers, many of them engineer officers, and there are about 120 of them who really need completion of their engineer instruction at this school down here before they are fully competent to become engineer officers.

Mr. HULINGS. I believe we have accommodations at our cantonments, and so forth, for about 2,000,000 troops, have we not?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have.

Mr. HULINGS. What, in the name of goodness, do we want now to expend $116,000 more money for making quarters for a lot of officers?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that at these cantonments there were no provisions made whatever for the accommodation of the family of an Army officer. In time of peace we must take care of the family of the officer of the United States Army. If we do not provide quarters, the law provides that we shall give them commutation in cash. We have got to do one or the other.

Mr. HULINGS. The gentleman has seen the accommodations provided for officers in some of these cantonments?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are utterly unfit to put a family in.

Mr. HULINGS. I do not know. I have lived in a great deal worse places with a family.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, I do not know; I think many day laborers have more comfortable homes than these old quarters would provide at the temporary cantonments.

Mr. BUTLER. When do you propose to abandon this school?

Mr. ANTHONY. We do not propose to abandon it.

Mr. BUTLER. You propose to keep it up?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is proposed to be kept as a training ground.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the gentleman has modified his joint resolution with an amendment, or proposes to do it?

Mr. ANTHONY. Proposing to return the engineer school.

Mr. BUTLER. To take the engineer school away. Is it necessary to spend $116,000 down there to keep that school a year?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, I will say to the gentleman. I have explained it several times. There are 70 officers' quarters there, perhaps 85 per cent complete. This $116,000 provides for their completion. The school has been moved there without the consent of Congress. If we are to permit it to operate this winter, we must complete those quarters and heat them; and if we do not expend this $116,000, at the advent of cold weather there will be no engineer school at any place.

Mr. BUTLER. The $116,000 is to complete the engineer school?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; to complete the temporary quarters that will permit them to use Camp Humphreys for that purpose this winter.

Mr. HULINGS. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized. [Loud applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and my friends of the House, nothing in my public life so affected me as the tribute paid by my colleagues here when you gave me a five weeks' absence "to attend to important business" in Philadelphia. I was speechless on that day—so speechless that I could not respond to what my heart prompted me to say. I went away almost regretful that I had asked the leave. But I have come back—less speechless during the five weeks than I was then—to find that that same fine spirit of good will and camaraderie you manifested then has not departed from you nor from this House.

Until my dying day I shall regard what you did then and what you have done in receiving me to-day as the finest tribute ever paid to me or to those who hold me dear. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, this is all I wanted to say. It is the "Thank you" that comes from the heart. [Applause.]

CAMP A. A. HUMPHREYS, VA.—SPECIAL RULE.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred H. Res. 307, submit a privileged report on said resolution with the recommendation that it be agreed to, as follows:

House resolution 307.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the consideration of H. J. Res. 208, the same being a "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp Humphreys, Va." That there shall be 30 minutes of general debate, one-half of the time to be used by those favoring the resolution and one-half by those opposing. That at the conclusion of the general debate the resolution shall be read for amendments, whereupon the resolution shall be reported to the House with amendments, if any. That the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and amendments to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution brings before the House for consideration the bill to which consideration has just been refused by unanimous consent. The condition as it has been brought to the Committee on Rules with respect to this matter is about this: During the fiscal year just closed the engineering school, without authority from Congress, but on the sole initiative of the War Department, was moved from the home established for it by Congress to Camp Humphreys. The winter is coming on, and the school if conducted there during the winter will be without heated quarters, and the school will have to close. The question is up to Congress at this moment whether or not it shall appropriate the amount of money necessary to complete the houses in which the men are to live with their families during the winter or whether the school shall be compelled to close. The Committee on Military Affairs by unanimous action reported the bill which the resolution I have just offered makes in order. So the bill comes as the unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs, as I have said, and the resolution making it in order comes as the unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. We were confronted with a condition that we could not dodge or avoid. The simple question was as to whether or not we should maintain during the ensuing winter an engineering school in connection with the War Department. And the present condition has been made necessary by the unwarranted action of the War Department in moving the school from the quarters created for it by Congress.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. GARD. I think I remember that when the report was read there was no designation by number. It was read with the number left blank.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was the number of the resolution I submitted. It will be numbered by the Clerk.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, when was the camp moved down to Virginia?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. During the last year.

Mr. BUTLER. And it was moved there without warrant?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Without warrant of law.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not bring it back to the place where it has existed, then? They will spend $116,000. That is an awful lot of money.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The buildings are filled up with material, reports, and so forth, and are also occupied by officers of the General Staff. As a matter of fact, the General Staff has crowded the engineering school out of Washington Barracks with the intention of making that a home for the General Staff.

Mr. BUTLER. There is only $116,000 involved, and the people will not care much about that—only for a few minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think, as long as we continue to make appropriations for these things that have been done without warrant of Congress, that the Congress will continue to be treated with contempt by the various departments and will not be consulted?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That kind of thing can not go on more than a year and five months longer.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. HULINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman if Congress is to go out and condone these continual, unjustified, and illegal acts of the War Department? What is the idea of permitting these things? Where the Military Committees of the House and Senate refuse to make appropriations for the building of a camp down there in Georgia the Secretary of War went right along and made a contract and put the Government in for paying the price, and instead of a proceeding for the condemnation of the land moved the people off the land, and then came to Congress and said that all of that had been done and that there was nothing to do but to pay. How long is Congress going to permit that sort of thing?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, we are in exactly the same position that a parent or a guardian would be in whose ward or son violated the law. It is up to the parent or the guardian to get the boy out of it the best he can. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. ROSE. I submit that the resolution now under consideration presents an entirely different feature from that suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] and one worthy of our support. Along with a number of members of the Committee on Military Affairs I visited Camp Humphreys recently, and I found a condition there that leads me to believe that it is the duty of this Congress to appropriate the sum of money carried by the pending resolution in order to continue the school at Camp Humphreys. We visited a number of the buildings wherein the school has been moved and met with some of the students. Among other places that we visited were the officers' quarters, that are now nearly completed and are not fit for occupation during the coming winter. There is not a building there now occupied by the officers that is provided with a heating plant nor with sewerage.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. How did the officers live there last winter, when they had all those troops there?

Mr. HULINGS. And had their wives with them.

Mr. ROSE. They were heated by open fireplaces. We learned that from the officials while we were there. Oftentimes they were uncomfortable.

One thing further. I was not satisfied with the prices mentioned to me for the construction of these buildings. I am not a builder, but I am of the opinion that the prices paid for the buildings used by the officers were entirely unwarranted and that money was lavishly wasted.

But there is another consideration that should be borne in mind, and that is good roads have been built from Alexandria down to Camp Humphreys at enormous cost, and if we abandon the school at this time I think it would be a useless waste of the public money; and in order to save it, since the school has been moved there on account of the crowded condition of the departments in Washington, it is our duty to care for these people during the winter months to come. Since the school has been moved there, it is the duty of Congress, as I view the situation, to appropriate the money asked for, in order that the officers now required to stay there may be comfortably quartered. For that reason I am in favor of the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I will yield time to any gentleman desiring it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Kansas stated that if we did not spend this $116,000 to build these quarters, the alternative would be to furnish commutation to 100 officers. Now, commutation to 100 officers for these few coming winter months would be much less than $116,000, would it not?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not sure as to that.

Mr. BLANTON. It would be over $1,000 to the officer.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is also stated in that connection that if these houses are completed they will need more than the mere heating plant to complete them. They will be there for the summer, to be used by the school when the field operations of the engineer school are in activity.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman's resolution provides for walks, sidewalks, paving, and a lot of other expenditures of money that might be avoided. It is said that it will be for the accommodation of these officers. I want them to be heated, but I have had so much to do with providing walks and sidewalks and trees and shrubbery, and so on, for the navy yards that this kind of thing makes one sick.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This can be taken care of.

Mr. BUTLER. I know that they can get along without sidewalks and roads for the winter.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] as to some things making him sick that I am getting a little bit tired of the kind of talk he indulges in. I am one member of the Committee on Military Affairs who has investigated this matter very thoroughly, and I assert that the opinion I have come to is my calm, deliberate judgment of what the business sense of this House is to-day. We have passed millions of dollars of appropriations which the gentleman's committee has brought in here without the batting of an eye, some of which no doubt on examination might be found subject to the same criticism as that which the gentleman has indulged in.

Mr. BUTLER. I have been quite safe in voting and recommending what I have voted and recommended.

Mr. ANTHONY. And down there if we do not provide a gravel walk the people will have to walk through a foot or two of Virginia mud or clay. Any man with an ounce of sense would know that it is necessary to build walks around these houses. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania has an honest criticism to present, I hope he will present it.

Mr. BUTLER. I have an honest criticism to make.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kansas yield a few minutes to me?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, during the war Camp Humphreys was established. The War Department was acting within its authority in establishing the camp. The question of whether it is to be the headquarters of the engineering school is one for Congress to determine. It can not be determined at this time. The Committee on Military Affairs ought to consider it and legislate on it, if necessary. Camp Humphreys at the time of the signing of the armistice was in the unfinished condition of practically all the camps. Congress said that no further work, no further expenditure, should be made on these camps, but in doing that Congress realized that eventually, in order to salvage what we had and save the investment we had made and make proper provision for the Army, it would be necessary to make some expenditure at some of the camps.

Now, when it came to the question of Camp Humphreys the Committee on Military Affairs thought we were justified in spending nearly $500,000. There were some of us who did not think we were justified in spending that amount. The matter was reexamined, whereupon it was decided that about $116,000 was the sum that would enable us to so complete arrangements and construction there as to make it possible properly to utilize for a useful purpose the large investment we have at Camp Humphreys. The committee has made a very conservative estimate of what is needed for the completion of a temporary establishment for present use. We must either expend that amount of money or practically lose all the benefit of the very great expenditure at Camp Humphreys, and there ought to be no question about the passage of this bill.

Mr. KEARNS. May I have three minutes?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago some five or six members of the Committee on Military Affairs went down to Camp Humphreys to inspect these alleged bungalows that are in process of building. I was one of the party. There are some bungalows of a similar character there that are already completed. We were told that those that are fully completed cost $6,400 each to the Government; that the contractor who had the contract to build these bungalows had charged the Government that sum of money for their completion. It seems to me that, in the opinion of any man competent to judge, these bungalows are worth about $2,500 apiece in their completed stage. It should be remembered that in their construction the Government furnished free to the contractor all the weatherboarding and the roofing, that there is practically nothing in them that cost any considerable sum of money except the flooring. The weatherboarding and roofing are no part of the $6,400. The flooring is the only part of the bungalows that is worth mentioning. There is no question that the Government has been greatly defrauded in the construction of these bungalows at Camp Humphreys. There is no further question, however, that in order to house these officers for the winter this additional expenditure should be made. Let us bear in mind in this connection the facts that controlled the Military Affairs Committee in recommending this sum of $116,000 for the completion of this work. The Secretary of War, under a Democratic Congress, spent $10,000,000 at this camp. The same authority asked the present Military Affairs Committee for $580,000 for a further temporary activity at that place, but we have pruned that amount to $116,000, thereby making a saving to the Government of nearly one-half million dollars. A very handsome sum in one item, and let it further be remembered that $116,000 is very ample to complete this work now sought to be done.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Out of what appropriation were these sums paid to these contractors?

Mr. KEARNS. I do not know.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Was the payment made in the hope that Congress would in the future appropriate something for it, or was there an appropriation?

Mr. KEARNS. I think my colleague has hit the nail on the head, to use a homely expression, when he makes that suggestion. But, however that may be, there are officers with their families at Camp Humphreys, and they must be taken care of this winter, and it seems to me that it would be a greater expense to the Government if we should refuse to do this, although I can not help thinking that this Congress is not justified in allowing such reckless expenditure of money as has been expended at Camp Humphreys upon this entirely temporary work. [Applause.] It is just this kind of outrage and looting of public funds that is now being viewed with dismay by the men and women of this country who are called upon to pay the bills so unwisely and oftentimes criminally contracted.

Mr. HICKS. The gentleman was making a statement a moment ago that I would like to inquire about. What would be the difference in cost between the amount to be appropriated here and the expense if we commutated those officers' quarters?

Mr. KEARNS. I can not answer that with a degree of certainty. I have no figures at hand upon which to premise an accurate answer, but the difference would be slight. I can not see, however, how that camp can be retained with the officer personnel unless we make provision for the expenditure of this additional sum of money. You must remember that the Military Affairs Committee has cut down the request from half a million dollars and over to $116,000, and we think in the completion of these so-called bungalows at Camp Humphreys we are going to save the Government the difference between $116,000 and $580,000, and thereby avoid to this extent the wasteful extravagance that has been committed at Camp Humphreys in the past.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman stated a moment ago that Congress had allowed this reckless waste. I assume that the gentleman meant the Sixty-fifth Congress. I should like to have the gentleman explain to this House what Congress has got to do with the expenditure of money.

Mr. KEARNS. Congress appropriates for the expenditure of money, and therefore I think Congress should hold itself responsible when men are allowed to run riot with Government funds.

As I said before, there is not a completed bungalow there that any Member of this Congress, if he were building for himself, would think of paying over $3,000 for, and that would include the ground that it stands on. This price would include roofing and weatherboarding all of good quality.

Mr. KNUTSON. What did they cost?

Mr. KEARNS. They cost $6,400 each, so we were told when there, and the Government furnished to the contractor the weatherboarding and the roofing, and there is not a single square foot of plastering in one of those buildings. There is nothing that would cost any considerable amount of money in their construction except the flooring.

Mr. LAYTON. Is the flooring finished hardwood?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Who was the contractor?

Mr. KEARNS. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion let me say these bungalows, if indeed they should be so dignified, are frame structures of, I think, five rooms, kitchen, and bath. With the exception of flooring they are constructed of the very cheapest material. In size I should think the rooms would average about 14 by 16 feet. There is no plastering in any of them and none have cellar or basement. In lieu of plastering the very cheapest of cardboard has been clumsily nailed to the joist. Each, I believe, has a porch. None of them has been painted either inside or out. Each one represents a monumental and disgraceful fraud upon the taxpayers of this Nation. I will vote for this additional sum in order that we can save a part of the $10,000,000 already spent.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota), there were—ayes 85, noes 14.

Accordingly the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. According to the terms of the resolution the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will take the chair. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. J. Res. 208, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 208) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to expend the following sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., for the completion of bungalow quarters, now partially constructed, including gravel roads, walks, sidewalks, sewers, electric-light lines, heating, water lines, painting, clearing, brushing, grading, sodding, and alteration of existing buildings and miscellaneous incidental construction incident thereto, $116,000.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to expend from sums already appropriated for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1920, such maintenance and repair funds as may be necessary for maintenance and repair work, storage of material and clearing up debris at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule there are 30 minutes allowed for general debate, to be equally divided.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I will say that I have no requests for time to debate this matter. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has an amendment that he desires to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anyone opposed to the bill?

Mr. WINGO. I am opposed to the bill, and I ask for recognition.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What was the Chairman's final majority? [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair has no objection to stating it privately.

[Mr. WINGO addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the indictment by the gentleman from Arkansas of his own administration, and particularly of his bitter criticism of the Secretary of War. Now, I want to say that all he said as to the waste and extravagance with which the money which Congress appropriated for the conduct of the war has been expended is all true, and no one condemns the waste and extravagance which is found on every hand in every branch of the military service more than this side of this Chamber.

One word more in regard to the pending bill. The Secretary of War asked Congress for over $500,000 to complete the temporary engineer project at Camp Humphreys. The Committee on Military Affairs, after patient and careful consideration, has cut that amount down to $116,000. We have practiced what we think is real economy, and we have presented our economical conclusion to the House, and we are going to ask you to ratify it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I have two or three minutes?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like about two or three minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Before that I shall have to yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] five minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question before he sits down?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. SNYDER. Is the gentleman able to tell the committee how much money the War Department has already spent at Camp Humphreys?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, I imagine eight or ten million dollars, offhand.

Mr. SNYDER. Has the gentleman visited the camp recently?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; within the last week.

Mr. SNYDER. He must have seen a great deal of material that has been pulled down and lies in piles on the ground——

Mr. ANTHONY. There is an immense amount of building material there——

Mr. SNYDER. But what is the purpose of this appropriation now? How much of the camp do they propose to keep by reason of the expenditure of $116,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. As I have explained, this only completes certain officers' quarters which are now over 80 per cent completed and makes them habitable.

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will yield for a further question, the capacity of the camp as a running plant is about 75,000 men?

Mr. ANTHONY. I had an idea it was about forty or fifty thousand. I think it is nearer 40,000.

Mr. SNYDER. My understanding is it was about 75,000. How many men do they propose to keep at this camp now if this money is appropriated?

Mr. ANTHONY. Between one or two thousand enlisted men, not over a regiment of Engineers, depending upon its strength, and about 200 officers under instruction.

Mr. SNYDER. The last time I was down there it was claimed there were about 11,000 men in the camp, and you could shoot a gatling gun through there and not hit one.

Mr. ANTHONY. These men had been demobilized, except about 750, when I was there the other day.

Mr. SNYDER. It seems to me, if you are going to attempt to keep that camp in operation, you are going to need a good deal more than $116,000. It looks nearer $116,000,000 would be needed.

Mr. ANTHONY. As a camp, it will not be kept in operation.

Mr. SNYDER. I should not think it should be. There is camp enough there for any army that this country ought to have in peace times.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise primarily for the purpose of reassuring the fearful soul of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] relative to railway legislation. Everyone knows—that is, everyone who is sufficiently interested to have kept track of the proceedings—that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House is now and has been in almost continuous session since the beginning of this session of Congress, studying the many and important questions involved in the problem of the future of the railways of the country.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. And it is hoped and confidently expected that that committee will report their findings and conclusions to this session of the Congress. I am sure that no one anywhere has attempted to delay the work of that committee unless it may be some who desire a method of procedure not approved by the great majority of the people. I am sure we all desire to pass upon the important questions involved as speedily as is consistent with thorough consideration.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman says it is intended to report at this session. That is the rumor I heard, but rumor also says it will be held over until the next session. Will the gentleman promise it will be considered at this session?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman now speaking can make no promises, as he is not a member of the committee. I have stated it is hoped and confidently expected that the committee will be able to conclude its consideration of the matter and report during this session of the Congress, and the subject will be taken up and considered in the House as soon as it is possible to do so. I believe it highly important that reasonably early action be had.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with regard to Camp Humphreys. We spent, as I understand it and as I am informed—I desire to be corrected if I am misinformed—in the neighborhood of $10,000,000 at Camp Humphreys. We have a property there that ought to be of some value to the Government. In the last military appropriation bill we prohibited the Secretary of War from making any further expenditures on camps and cantonments without authority by Congress. I doubt if the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], who is now so anxious to have economy practiced, favored that legislation.

Mr. WINGO. On what does the gentleman base that?

Mr. MONDELL. At least there was opposition to it on that side of the Chamber. Gentlemen on that side did not seem disposed to restrict the Secretary of War in his expenditures. Nevertheless. Congress did restrict expenditures on these camps, but Congress did not do it with any fool notion that there would be no expenditure required anywhere on these camps. The effort of the Congress was to prevent the same kind of extravagance and unnecessary expenditure that had been going on. The administration has evidenced what it would have done at this particular camp if it had not been prohibited, by asking for $580,000, probably much less than the Secretary would have spent if we had left him free to make expenditures without coming to Congress for authority so to do. The Committee on Military Affairs has reduced the estimate of the department from $580,000 to $116,000, or approximately 1 per cent of our outlay at Camp Humphreys. We are proposing to spend approximately 1 per cent for the purpose of making available for use property secured at an enormous expenditure.

Now, I do not know whether this camp should be a permanent Engineers school or not. My own notion is that there are some very good arguments in favor of that being done, but that is a matter for the Military Committee to determine. At any rate, we must make this expenditure in order to make available for immediate use the buildings and the equipment we now have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. There are four minutes remaining.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am not in sympathy with my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] in his criticism of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I know something about the railroad problem and am satisfied that it exceeds in importance and complexity almost any other great subject that is being considered by Congress. And my own conviction is that the committee would make a capital mistake in bringing a bill in here disposing of that problem except after the very fullest and most careful consideration. [Applause.]

Now, so far as the particular matter under discussion is concerned, the fact is that several members of the Committee on Military Affairs—I think some seven of them—visited Camp Humphreys and, after looking into the situation there, reached a conclusion which they bring to the House, as expressed in this resolution. That conclusion is opposed by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], who admits that he speaks without the intimate knowledge which the Committee on Military Affairs, of course, possesses. In view of the very confident way in which, nevertheless, he states his position, the remark that Charles Lamb made about some one, of whom he said that "The twilight of dubiety never seems to fall upon him," might be applied to my distinguished friend.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In one minute there is little opportunity.

The committee has investigated, and what do they find as the specific facts? Let us see: There has been an expenditure at Camp Humphreys which may have been wasteful or otherwise. There was a great school established there for the instruction of engineers, where engineers were instructed, may of whom, I understand, were sent to Europe during the war. There is no other camp in proximity to Washington where the physical conditions are such that an engineering school can be maintained for the present. The school can not be maintained at Humphreys without completing quarters for the officers. Those quarters are in process of being completed, and the question for us to determine is whether we will abandon Camp Humphreys as an engineering school or complete the quarters and allow that school to continue in operation for the present. That is, I think, a fair summary of the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. One minute further, if I may be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Well, if I have no more time I will at least say that I am very glad that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, who has just returned to us from Philadelphia, had a very successful trip. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has one minute remaining.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield that one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for one minute.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to ask unanimous consent for five minutes outside of the rule, without taking anybody's time.

The CHAIRMAN. That can not be done under the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman can get time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I shall not take time now.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to expend the following sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., for the completion of bungalow quarters, now partially constructed, including gravel roads, walks, sidewalks, sewers, electric-light lines, heating, water lines, painting, clearing, brushing, grading, sodding, and alteration of existing buildings and miscellaneous incidental construction incident thereto, $116,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, before the war the engineering school existed at the Washington Barracks. During the war the engineering troops were trained at Camp Humphreys, and some ten millions of dollars were spent on the place. At the conclusion of the hostilities the school, which originally had only 30 students, had increased to 110 students. In addition to this, there were about 180 of the West Point cadets, who had been graduated ahead of time, assigned to this place for the completion of their instruction. This makes a temporary condition at the camp which the Washington Barracks is wholly inadequate to meet. There is no room down at the Washington Barracks for the 110 additional students, and there is no room for the 180 West Point cadets.

The retention of the engineering school at the camp was not accomplished in the dark. The Military Affairs Committee was fully advised of the purpose of the War Department and deliberately and after full consideration so changed the phraseology found in former appropriation bills as to confer this authority on the War Department. And the bill reported by the Military Affairs Committee was enacted into law without amendment in this respect by the preceding Congress. Under this authority the War Department was proceeding with the necessary construction work when the legislation in the last appropriation bill put an end to all construction work. They had, I believe, about 70 buildings under contract. About 30 of them were nearly completed. Some of them have not yet been begun. The War Department asked an appropriation of something like $500,000 to complete all the buildings which the officers required, which, as I have stated, were about 70. The Military Affairs Committee favorably reported the bill, but owing to the opposition in the House a great deal of delay has ensued. It is doubtful if the 70 buildings could be constructed now before winter. A subcommittee visited the camp and have agreed that all that would be necessary to do at the present time would be to complete those quarters for the officers which were now under construction, and therefore the appropriation has been reduced to $116,000, instead of $500,000 which the original bill contemplated. The change, therefore, takes care of quarters for 30 officers and the others will be given commutation. The constructions are of the bungalow type and are very plain and simple.

Now, if that is not done there will be a great loss on these bungalows, which are very nearly completed in some cases and in other cases just begun, a loss which could be saved by the completion of the bungalows. The Army must have an engineer school; I do not care what size of an Army we finally determine upon; and I want to insist here, as I have insisted before, that I am thoroughly opposed to this war program of having a great standing army, but all are in favor of the adequate training of those officers we must have in the essential branches of the service. I do not care how large or how small the Army is to be, the Army is obliged to have an engineer school somewhere. If we do not go ahead and complete the quarters for these officers at Camp Humphreys, we must build them somewhere else.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman contemplate this to be retained permanently as an engineer school? I understood certain gentlemen to say that it was not so contemplated.

Mr. HARRISON. This appropriation does not contemplate that at all. It is simply to make temporary quarters for the officers until a final scheme can be concluded. I do not care where you go, gentlemen, whether you go to Camp Humphreys or elsewhere, you must incur this expense or pay commutation. Washington Barracks is no longer an adequate place for 110 students, and, at least temporarily, quarters must be found elsewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman seems to be very familiar with the necessities of the Government in respect to engineering matters.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not say that.

Mr. LAYTON. Do you know whether or not, with all the millions and billions we have spent all over the United States, there are already buildings in some camps that will house these people?

Mr. HARRISON. No; there is no place adequate——

Mr. LAYTON. Except this?

Mr. HARRISON. There is no place that is adequate for the training of engineers. You are going to wake up some day and find that this idea that you have got large housing facilities for officers and troops is a gross fallacy. There are only permanent quarters for 5,000 officers now and 73,000 soldiers. These cantonments are buildings that are rapidly going into decay. They have never been painted, and when we come to establish an Army you will find that there will be a big appropriation asked for construction work to make permanent quarters for both men and officers.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. How many officers are to be accommodated in these quarters?

Mr. HARRISON. I think about a hundred and some.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Now, what would be the amount required for commutation in cash for these officers if these quarters were not furnished?

Mr. HARRISON. It would be a very expensive proposition. It is much cheaper to build these quarters than to pay commutation. I was coming to that in a minute.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That was the point of comparison I had in mind. We pay out commutation, and the money is gone, and you have nothing to show for it.

Mr. HARRISON. You will find commutation is 10 per cent on $10,000. That is my recollection. I would not vouch for it offhand. Of course it depends on whether a man is married and has children and what family he has.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. These bungalows, if completed, are only for the married officers?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and the estimated cost of these bungalows for these quarters is about $6,200 each. To make alterations in the cantonment buildings, owing to the flimsy construction of these buildings, would cost almost as much and the quarters provided would be most undesirable. Wherever we establish this permanent school of engineering we have got to provide officers' quarters, and this will not be money thrown away on a temporary project, because when you come to create the permanent project it will be years before you can get these permanent quarters finally constructed, and in the meantime these temporary quarters will serve the necessary purpose. I believe the time will come when it will be found that Camp Humphreys is so adequate for all the uses of an engineering school that it will be finally selected as a permanent camp; and if it is, the money that we spend down there now for these temporary quarters will not be wasted, because they will be necessary to house the officers until permanent quarters are finished. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. Section 1 of this joint resolution authorizes an expenditure from an appropriation of several million dollars already made, as I understand it, which appropriation was a lump sum?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It provides—

That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to expend—

And so forth.

Would the gentleman have any objection to inserting the words "not exceeding"?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that would be an improvement.

Mr. CANNON. Very well, then. I will move to amend by inserting after the word "expend," in line 4, the words "not exceeding," so that he will be authorized to expend not exceeding the following sums.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest to the gentleman that perhaps the words "not exceeding" ought to go in just preceding the figures "$116,000," in line 11.

Mr. CANNON. I will adopt the gentleman's suggestion, and move to insert the words "not exceeding" after the word "thereto," in line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 1, line 11, after the word "thereto," insert the words "not exceeding."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, one word further. The Clerk has at the desk an amendment which I wish to offer when the proper place in the bill is reached. In my five minutes I will ask the Clerk to report that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment for information only.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That the Engineer school shall be returned to its former location at Washington Barracks by the end of the present fiscal year."

Mr. CANNON. I will offer that as an amendment to section 2.

Mr. HARRISON. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not offered now. It is simply read for information. It is to come in as an amendment to section 2.

Mr. GARD. A parliamentary inquiry. Has section 2 been read?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the amendment was read in the time of the gentleman from Illinois, for information.

Mr. CANNON. Before the Clerk reads section 2 I will move to strike out the figures in line 11, page 1, "$116,000," and will move to amend by inserting the figures "$115,900," with the proviso which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 1, line 11, strike out "$116,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$115,900: Provided, That the Engineer school shall be returned to its former location at Washington Barracks by the end of the present fiscal year."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment, on the ground that it is not germane to the subject matter of the joint resolution. Part of the amendment is germane in that it reduces the amount, but the remainder of the amendment is not germane, and part of it not being germane, the whole of it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard?

Mr. CANNON. I think the amendment is germane. It reduces expenditures, and under the Holman rule I think it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this is not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. I know it is not, and yet it is tolerably general. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would undoubtedly be in order under the Holman rule, because of the fact that the plans of the War Department provide for the ultimate erection of a permanent school at Camp Humphreys, at a cost of $32,000,000, and the gentleman's amendment to move the engineering school back to Washington Barracks would ultimately save the Government $32,000,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. But this is not a question of the ultimate project. This is only for temporary construction on a piece of property that the United States Government owns. It is nothing about the engineering school, or any ultimate project to build a new school. The question now is whether you are going to give these officers a place to sleep in the wintertime, or whether you are going to stick them out in a tent.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I wish to say a word or two with respect to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] that this amendment would come under the Holman rule. The statement of fact that he makes relates to a situation that is entirely outside of the record. Hence this body can not say whether the amendment would, or would not operate to reduce expenditures, since the House has no knowledge that the expenditures referred to by the gentleman are to be undertaken. The mere fact that the War Department has in mind, if authorized, to make large expenditures at Camp Humphreys does not operate to bring the amendment within the Holman rule, for the manifest reason that this scheme of the department may, or may not be carried into effect. Hence in that view, how can it be definitely said that this amendment of its own force, will serve to reduce expenditures?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that the information has been officially brought to the attention of a committee of Congress.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Even if the department contemplates such a scheme still that scheme has not taken any definite form. It has not received the sanction of Congress. The amendment is not in order merely because it will reduce something that is in the mind of the War Department. This would be an extraordinary application of the Holman rule.

Mr. CANNON. This does reduce the amount.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, the amendment proposes a reduction, but the legislation proposed will not effect that reduction. It is always competent on motion to reduce the amount of an appropriation, but it is not in order, merely by proposing to reduce the amount of an appropriation, to hang on to it legislation that is not connected with the reduction, and which in itself does not operate to make that reduction. This proposition has been before the House many times. Plainly, the legislation proposed by the gentleman from Illinois will not in itself make the reduction. The reduction may be made without the aid of the balance of the amendment. At any time an amount in an appropriation bill may be reduced to any extent approved by the House. But I repeat that the legislation proposed will not operate to effect the reduction suggested. Hence it is not related, or germane, to the reducing part of the amendment. For that reason the entire amendment is out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the only law authorizing the removal of the engineer school even temporarily, as proposed, from the Washington Barracks to Camp Humphreys is in the resolution under consideration. Certainly if this resolution indirectly provides for the temporary removal of the engineer school from the Washington Barracks to Camp Humphreys, an amendment providing for the return of the engineer school to its original home would be germane and therefore would be in order. I submit that clearly, though not expressly provided therein, it is the sole purpose of this resolution to temporarily remove the engineer school, and why should not this amendment be in order when it provides that the school shall be brought back by a time certain?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. There is nothing of that sort in the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the purpose.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The resolution simply makes an appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. The Military Affairs Committee comes on the floor with the avowed purpose of providing for the temporary removal of the engineer school from Washington Barracks to Camp Humphreys. Most of this discussion since Congress convened to-day has revolved around this question of removal.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The resolution does not move the engineer school. It contemplates the appropriation of a sum of money pure and simple.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to argue the point of order, except to this extent: I see nothing in the resolution that says anything about the Washington Barracks. All the House can go by is the business before it. If gentlemen insert extraneous matter in order to make a proposition germane, it ought not to affect the rule, and the House has nothing to do with it. There is no mention of Washington Barracks in this resolution; it is merely a question of whether they will appropriate money for Camp Humphreys.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I will say in addition that the claim that this is for the purpose of moving the school does not fit the facts. The school is already at Camp Humphreys, and this is only for the purpose of giving temporary quarters to the Army engineers and their families assigned to duty at that place. All this talk about the removal of the engineer school is not germane, the amendment is not germane, and I ask the Chair to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill provides that the Secretary of War is authorized to expend a certain sum of money for the completion of bungalow quarters, now partially constructed, including gravel roads, walks, sidewalks, sewers, electric-light lines, heating, water lines, painting, clearing, brushing, grading, sodding, and alteration of existing buildings and miscellaneous incidental construction incident thereto, $116,000.

The amendment proposes to reduce the appropriation to $115,900, with the following proviso:

That the engineer school shall be returned to its former location at Washington Barracks by the end of the present fiscal year.

The Holman rule applies only to general appropriation bills. It can not be invoked as to this bill. So far as the question of germaneness is concerned, it is clear to the Chair that under section 7 of Rule XVI, which reads as follows:

And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment—the amendment is not germane. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on September 16, 1919, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 6808. An act to incorporate the American Legion.

CAMP A. A. HUMPHREYS, VA.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, authorized to expend from sums already appropriated for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1920, such maintenance and repair funds as may be necessary for maintenance and repair work, storage of material, and clearing up débris at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 2, page 2, after the word "expend," by inserting the words "not exceeding $10,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "expend," insert the words "not exceeding $10,000."

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is the gentleman sure that $10,000 will be sufficient to clean up all the débris and machinery around Camp Humphreys?

Mr. CANNON. This money comes from a many million dollars lump sum. Is the gentleman aware that they could spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in this way?

Mr. CALDWELL. I was going to ask the gentleman if he would not agree to make it $20,000 instead of $10,000, so as to be sure to have enough.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would state for the information of the gentleman that Congress appropriates large lump sums for the maintenance of barracks and quarters at all the posts, and the Secretary of War allots that generally at the beginning of the fiscal year, apportioning it to the different posts. He can use all of it probably at one place for the purpose of maintenance, but it is not probable, the committee thought, if we gave them authority to maintain the buildings at this camp, to repair them, that the authorities there would use any more than is absolutely necessary for that purpose. At the same time I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] that it would perhaps be safer to make the amount $20,000 for the maintenance of such tremendous property as exists there.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; I will modify the amendment to make it read $20,000 instead of $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. CANNON:
Page 2, line 2, after the word "expend" insert the words "not exceeding $20,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration H. J. Res. 208, authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the resolution as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution as amended.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed and lay that motion on the table.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, pending that, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. GARD. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to ask that House joint resolution 161 lie on the table?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution 161, which covers the very same question, do lie upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed and to lay that motion on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that House joint resolution 161 do lie on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks on the bill which has just been passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes." Pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that we be allowed an additional hour for general debate. There have been many more requests for time in general debate than we expected. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has returned and will occupy an hour of time. It was not expected that he would be present. The chairman, therefore, would not have any time. I would like to have a little time in which to discuss the bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that we may have one more hour of general debate, to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of general debate be extended for one hour, to be controlled by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman expect to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] any part of his time?

Mr. FORDNEY. I understood that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was going to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania a portion of his time. I would like to have three-quarters of an hour. I have only 20 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG], a member of the committee, wants 30 minutes. I would be glad if the gentleman from North Carolina would yield some of his time to Mr. MOORE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Since the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is right on some of the provisions in the bill, I will yield him an hour of my time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I know the gentleman is always fair, when he sees the light.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8078.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8078, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not going to undertake to discuss the bill under consideration, but will avail myself of the few minutes allotted to me to touch briefly upon a disaster that has almost destroyed the major portion of the district which I have the honor to represent. You probably have read in the newspapers of the storm upon the Texas coast. Over three-fourths of the devastated area is embraced within the fourteenth congressional district. I feel it would be improper for me to let this occasion pass without a word of appreciation not only to my colleagues in Congress but to the departments of the Government and the citizenship of the Union generally for their sympathy and aid and the universal response that has been made to the appeals that have gone out from the brave stricken people of that section. That response has come from every portion of the United States, and but illustrates the truth of the statement that "one touch of nature makes the whole world akin." The area devastated by this unusual storm is the fairest in the land. It nestles along the Texas coast, by the Gulf of Mexico, and in the numerous bays and inlets that dot it. It is the garden spot of the world. Not more than a week ago it held a happy, prosperous, and contented people. They had their crops, their herds, their fruit, semitropical in character, and almost without warning all has been swept away. Approximately $20,000,000 worth of property has been destroyed and not less than 500 men, women, and children have gone to their graves. Thousands of people are homeless, made so overnight, and left without even the ordinary wearing apparel. It is a situation that appeals to the sympathetic heart of this Nation, which has never failed to respond to the cry of distress, and has not this day failed.

In time they will rebuild, because the courage with which American people always meet misfortune will assert itself with them. I bring for them this message to the Congress, and say that in the midst of this terrific disaster, when darkness has fallen like the heavy pall of night over their happiness and their homes and the sea is giving up its dead, they are meeting their disaster with courage and their trials with that high mindedness of purpose and fidelity to life that gives us the hope in the years to come. I will close this tribute by saying to you in the language of the poet that the people, these now under the pall of affliction and whom the heavy hand of death and misfortune has overwhelmed but not destroyed, can truthfully say:

In the fell clutch of circumstances they have not winced nor cried aloud,
Under the bludgeonings of chance their heads are bloody but unbowed.

Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I have always believed in a protective tariff. Perhaps I have been rather radical in the opinion that the importation of foreign manufactures of goods that we can produce in this country simply displaces that much American labor.

I need make no argument in regard to this matter. Abraham Lincoln put the whole argument into a nutshell. Said he, "If we buy our steel rails from England, we get the rails and England gets the money; but if we make our own rails, we get the rails and we keep the money."

So I am thoroughly in favor of the provisions of this bill that seeks by a tariff to protect American industry in the manufacture of dyestuffs.

I am confident that American skill and brains, if protected by an adequate tariff while the business is in its infancy, will do for dyestuffs practically what American skill and brains did for tin. We were producing no tin in this country. Somebody—and I think it was William McKinley—suggested a tariff on tin, which was jeered at; but a tariff was imposed which fostered the tin industry. It was not long until we were supplying ourselves with tin at prices about half that we had formerly paid to Wales, and now I understand we are the greatest exporters of tin in the world.

But I regard with grave doubt the wisdom of constructing an organization that shall have power to say who shall be authorized or licensed to import foreign dyes.

The Alien Property Custodian seized about 4,500 German patents for manufacturing dyes and sold them to a number of gentlemen who incorporated themselves under the laws of Delaware as the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), for the sum of $250,000.

Germany led the world in the science of dye making, and naturally all her most valuable discoveries in this art were protected by filing her patents with this Government, and it is hardly to be expected that she would go to the trouble and expense in filing patents with the American Patent Office that were worthless patents or that covered but a small proportion of the methods under which she had established a monopoly of the dye-making business in this country.

Presumably the Chemical Foundation did not pay more than these patents were worth, and presumably the Chemical Foundation Co. is composed of people who are interested in the dye business, and as owners of patents that cover the most valuable methods of making dyes that science has discovered the Chemical Foundation Co. has it within its power to retain the use of these patents for itself or for its constituent members or to make the terms upon which it will allow any competitor to use these patents.

And, if I am right about this, the Government in making sale of these patents, which, of course, conveys to the purchasers the exclusive right to use them, has already handed out a complete, obnoxious, rock-ribbed monopoly for the manufacture of American dyestuffs, which monopoly at the will of the Chemical Foundation will exist at least until new processes shall be invented which may be equal to or superior to the German patents.

That is the situation as regards American manufacture of dyestuffs.

But there are some dyes that we do not yet or perhaps can not make in America, and on the plea that we must still get certain kinds of foreign dyes this bill would give certain licensees permission to import such quantities of such dyes on such terms as the licensing commission created by this bill might choose to give.

There is a grave suspicion that there is a community of interest between the licensing commission and the owners of the German patents, and if there is not yet such community of interest, in the very nature of things there soon will be.

Assuming—and it is a most natural assumption—that the German patents cover the most recent and up-to-date methods that Germany in its laboratories has been able to discover, and with all these patents under the absolute control of the Chemical Foundation, its control of American manufacture of dyestuffs naturally follows.

It will naturally farm out these patents to its constituent dye manufacturers and thus insure within the circle of its favor a monopoly of the American-made dyes.

And now, on the top of this, when you create a licensing commission by this bill which shall have the right to say who shall buy foreign dyes, you have created a monopoly which no independent concern can ever hope to break down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULINGS. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HULINGS. Can not the gentleman make it five minutes? I will say four minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us divide; say, two and a half minutes. I yield three minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. HULINGS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield? I desire to correct the gentleman's statement. The gentleman in speaking has used the word "monopoly."

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman aware that the German patents control less than one-fifth of the dyes that are now made in the American market?

Mr. HULINGS. That may be.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman speaks of a monopoly. Those patents only apply to less than one-fifth of the American product of dyes.

Mr. HULINGS. The Germans did monopolize the German dyestuffs in this country before the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But not due to patents in this country.

Mr. HULINGS. Through their patents.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. HULINGS. Perhaps I may be entirely mistaken, but I give it for what it is worth.

It seems entirely incredible that Germany would go to the trouble and expense of filing 4,500 patents and that those patents should only apply to less than one-fifth of the German product of dyes, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, as stated in the outset, I am in favor of imposing a tariff to protect American manufacturers of dyestuffs, and instead of proceeding any further with this paternalism of Government and the creation of bureaus and licensing commissions, as we have done during the stress of war, I think the Government should begin condemnation proceedings to reacquire these patents and throw them open to the use of every citizen seeking to make dyes, and then pass a tariff law which will protect such industries against foreign competition, making the tariff high enough to stop the importation of such dyes as we already make and high enough on the kind of dyes that we do not yet make so as to create and develop the making of all kinds of dyes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appear only for the purpose of correcting an erroneous impression created by the gentleman from Indiana, my good friend, Mr. WOOD, on August 21, while discussing the tariff bill. I will ask that the Clerk read the extract from the gentleman's speech on that occasion in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And I wish to call the attention of some of you southern gentlemen to the situation existing in your own country, where protection is needed for development more than in any other section of the United States. Before we got into this war a number of gentlemen, Members of this House, while in the State of Texas discovered that in all that country where previously there had been a great many sugar mills running only a few years ago when the protective tariff was upon the sugar industry, sufficient to warrant the manufacture of sugar, and when rice hullers were seen upon every side, every one of those sugar refineries was idle except one, every one of those rice hullers was idle. Why was it? You had only to ask the men who had raised cane and rice and they would tell you that it was due to the damning influence of the Underwood bill which had destroyed those industries.

In all of the country round about the one factory that was running at Sugar Land, in the State of Texas, they did not raise cane sufficient to satisfy one mill and they were importing it from Cuba.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Gentlemen, the question of growing cane in Texas has never been attempted by free labor. It has been grown and handled exclusively by convict labor. No man in Texas under the climatic conditions there would attempt to grow cane for making sugar with free labor, for the reason that the cane can not be harvested until late in the fall, until frost comes, because it is not profitable until then. It does not contain the properties for making sugar until cold weather strikes it. After that period arrives it must be cut and gathered in before a freeze comes, for the reason that the freeze ruins it entirely. The consequence is that a cane crop in Texas must be cut and gathered within a period of about three or four weeks ordinarily. The frost does not come in southern Texas until about the 1st of December. Then the cane must all be cut and wind-rowed and protected from the freeze before the freeze strikes it, which is usually in the latter part of the month of December.

If you are to handle a crop of some five or six thousand acres of cane it will require several thousand men to do it within that short period of time. Up to about six years ago it was handled exclusively by convict labor. At that time the Legislature of Texas, under the administration of Gov. Colquitt, passed a law prohibiting the use of convict labor for that purpose and prohibiting the hiring of convicts to anyone for any purpose. The consequence was that every sugar mill in Texas that was not prepared to import its raw sugar from Cuba or from some other country went out of business. In fact, we had only two sugar mills—one, the Imperial, located at Sugar Land, as referred to by the gentleman from Indiana, my good friend, Mr. WOOD, and the other at Eagle Lake, known as the Lakeside.

Knowing this must be the condition, I telegraphed to the manager of the Imperial refinery, and I will ask the Clerk to read the telegram which I received from him in reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUGAR LAND, TEX., September 2, 1919.

Hon. J. J. MANSFIELD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your wire of this date, you are informed that our output of refined sugar now exceeds that of former years, when growing our own cane, by many millions of pounds per annum. Our only reason for importing from Cuba is on account of labor conditions, and not on account of the tariff. Eldridge, sr., now en route New York.

W. T. ELDRIDGE, Jr.,
General Manager Imperial Sugar Refinery.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the question of farm labor has been a serious question in Texas in recent years. Mexican labor has now to be imported for the purpose of gathering the cotton crop, and it would be quite impossible to secure enough labor from any source to gather a crop of sugar cane. When convicts were available for that purpose the sugar grower could procure them in sufficient numbers to cut and windrow the cane within the short period of time in which that work could be done. I am not criticizing the legislature for prohibiting the hiring of convicts. That is not my purpose. My only reason for mentioning the fact is to correct the impression made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

After the enactment of the law prohibiting the use of convict labor by sugar growers, the Imperial, one of the largest refineries in the world, began to utilize its lands for other crops and to import raw sugar from Cuba, it having its own railway and steamship lines to use in connection with the refinery.

As a matter of fact, there has been no diminution in the output of the Imperial refinery, but, as shown by the telegram of Manager Eldridge, there has been a great increase in the quantity of sugar refined. This is conclusive evidence that the tariff had nothing to do with the question, for if the tariff was the cause, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], the result would have been a decrease in the quantity of sugar refined instead of a decrease in the quantity of sugar cane grown.

The Imperial refinery is in full operation and prospering as it never prospered before. Its capacity has been greatly enlarged since commencing its great importations of raw sugar from Cuba, and Col. Eldridge, the president of the Sugar Land Railroad, which is operated in connection with the refinery, informed me a few days ago that no protective tariff was desired by the Imperial. This "infant" is able to stand alone, and is not asking for any subsidy at the hands of the taxpayers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULINGS. I wish to also ask permission to speak about something that is not in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks leave also to extend his remarks with regard——

Mr. HULINGS. To the labor question. I was not here the other day when that bill was up.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask to do that in connection with these remarks?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks leave also to extend his remarks to include the consideration of the labor situation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill in my opinion relates to a matter of very great importance to our people. Before the war there was produced in the world, in round numbers, $100,000,000 worth of dyestuffs. Seventy-five per cent of the world's production was produced in Germany, the other 25 per cent by many nations, chiefly England and Russia. The people of the United States consumed of that total world's production annually about 15 per cent. We have in this country all the raw material for the manufacture of dyestuffs for the entire world—coal tars and salt brine. We have the money and we have the labor and the skill, and the desire to produce the dyestuffs for our own people, for our entire consumption. And the only reason why we may not in the future produce all our dyestuffs is because of lack of adequate laws to protect the people engaged in their manufacture, in the wage scale paid to labor in this country, which is the highest paid labor in the world.

Whatever competition we had before the war from Europe, and which has disappeared because of this war, has sprung up in the Orient, and to-day China and Japan are the competitors of American manufacturers of dyestuffs, and a more keen competition may be expected from the Orient in the future than we ever had between this country and Europe, for the reason that the wages paid to labor in Japan and in China are much below the wage scale heretofore paid in Europe and that will be paid in the future. Our wage scale in this country to-day is between $4 and $5 per day on an average in the dyestuff industry, while the wage scale in Japan is from 15 to 30 cents a day for an 11½-hour day, while our labor is employed at 8 hours, though, in some instances, 10 hours. Therefore, gentlemen, it behooves the Congress of the United States to enact adequate laws to sustain that industry in the United States—an industry of such great importance not only to the dye manufacturers of this country, but to many other industries of greater importance, with more capital invested than that invested in the dye industry, and especially in time of war. We found ourselves during this last war lacking in explosives and chemicals of all kinds. A dyestuff institution, as shown by the testimony presented to the Committee on Ways and Means, can be very quickly and cheaply converted into an institution for the manufacture of explosives, and vice versa. At a very nominal cost the institution can be changed to the production of either one, dyestuffs or explosives.

This bill has my approval, with the single exception of one feature; and if it is the wisdom of the House that that feature shall remain in the bill and be enacted into law, I will acquiesce and vote for the bill. I will stand by the majority of my party at all times. That feature is the licensing feature. There is a provision in this bill that creates by law a commission, which is given power to control the importation of dyestuffs, and for fear that commission might be political, if appointed by the administration, the committee has provided a paragraph in the bill naming the associations which may appoint the members of that commission.

If we are to have this commission and it is found to be constitutional, I want to see that provision remain in this bill. The bill gives the power to the users of dyestuffs, together with the manufacturers of dyestuffs, to name that commission, and of the 11 men provided for as members of that commission, 6 are to be representatives of the industries that use dyestuffs.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. FESS. That feature of the bill has been very disturbing to me. To whom will this commission be responsible?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman has asked a question that is very hard for me to answer.

Mr. FESS. It troubles me very much.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am opposed to the commission, I will say, in answer to the gentleman. But let me say that I believe by the adoption or the enactment into law of rates of duty sufficient to offset the difference between our cost of production and of that abroad, together with an adequate antidumping law, we will have given adequate protection to American institutions to enable them to continue.

Let me say for the benefit of the House that I have put in much time upon, and I have not yet quite concluded, a bill which I shall introduce in the very near future providing for an antidumping law.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Does the gentleman expect to have that bill discussed and passed at this session?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I do. I hope to have that bill before the committee within the next 10 days. I will say to gentlemen of the House that it is a matter of very great importance in the drafting of that bill to have it constitutional, to have it stand the test of the challenge which will certainly be brought forward immediately by the importer who pays an ad valorem duty. It is intended to regulate the dishonest importer who will undervalue the products that he brings into this country in order to evade the payment of the just and equitable duties of the Treasury Department.

Only yesterday the Secretary of the Treasury very kindly directed three members of the board of appraisers at New York to come over here on Thursday of this week to help me frame that bill, or at least to discuss it and enable me to get their views and their judgment upon the legality of the proposed act. They are the men to whom those matters would be referred for decision if we had such a law upon our statute books.

With that antidumping clause in the law, let me repeat, together with a reasonable amount of duty imposed upon the imports, I believe our institutions can in the future be adequately protected against erroneous, unjust, and unlawful competition from abroad. [Applause.]

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY Yes.

Mr. WELLING. You stated in your preliminary statement that the wages in Japan were about 20 cents a day?

Mr. FORDNEY. From 15 to 30 cents.

Mr. WELLING. And the wages here $4 a day?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Would any tariff that we can levy here protect the American workman against a wage scale one-twentieth of ours?

Mr. FORDNEY. It would be difficult, for under our international laws we can not make a duty on imports coming from Japan different from the duty on imports coming from Europe, and there is where the difficulty comes in in framing a law that will protect us against all the world, for the reason that if the rates of duty in a law are high enough to protect us against Japanese labor, then those rates will be prohibitive to Europe, and if the rate only offsets the difference between our cost of production and the cost in Europe, it is not sufficiently high to give adequate protection to American labor against oriental labor. There is the difficulty, my friends, in framing a tariff law to make it equitable and just to all our people as against all the outside world.

Mr. WELLING. Would not that difficulty and necessity warrant a provision in this bill for a licensing board?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. The licensing board has nothing to do with the rates of duty. The licensing board would be legally or in justice bound to issue to you a license to bring into this country dyestuffs that you can not procure in this country, no matter from what country you wished to import. That is the fundamental authority of this licensing board. But, my good friends, there are many gentlemen on the Democratic side who do not agree with me as to a protective tariff. I do not criticize them, although they differ in their opinions from mine. They claim that a protective tariff creates a monopoly. I deny the correctness of that statement. I do not believe that a tariff law ever created a monopoly. But is there any question under the sun that the creation of this licensing board is a monopoly? You are enacting into law, without any question, a monopoly.

Let me tell you why, my good friends. First of all, at the beginning of this war it was found that the Germans held patents for the manufacture of chemicals in this country to the number of 4,500 patents. Our Alien Property Custodian took over those patents and sold them, in my opinion, in the wrong way. The law provided that property should be sold at public auction. But by Executive order those patents were sold at private sale to a corporation known under the title of the Chemical Foundation. The assistant custodian, Mr. Garvan, was made the president of the Chemical Foundation Corporation, which purchased these patents for $250,000. I have been reliably informed that one manufacturer states that he will give $50,000 a year for the use of one of those patents. Now, whether that is true or not I do not know, but my information comes from a Member of the House. If that be true, then those patents were in all probability sold for less money than they are worth. Whether that is true or not, I do not care. I am not arguing that question. But the Chemical Foundation controls 4,500 patents. Many of them are valueless, of course. But it is within their power to issue a license to whomsoever they choose for the manufacture of chemicals under those patents, and I have been informed already by one of the most reliable institutions of this country, a chemical manufacturer—I do not care to present his name, because he is one of the stockholders of the Chemical Foundation—that he has been refused a license to manufacture certain chemicals under those patents, although he is a stockholder of the corporation.

Therefore, my good friends, those licenses will be issued by the Chemical Foundation to their favorites, without any question. On the other hand, suppose that this licensing commission that will have control of the importations of dyestuffs meet with a number of gentlemen, say, 50 in number, who want licenses to import dyestuffs. Do you believe they will issue a license to the whole 50, to all applicants? If so, what is the necessity for a license? Why not let everybody import? If they do not grant permission to all who come and ask for it, then certainly they will select their friends. Let me give you an illustration under existing conditions. Our War Trade Board now have the authority to issue licenses. Importations of dyestuffs can not come into this country now except under licenses issued by the War Trade Board. I have a statement here from a member of an association that made application to the War Trade Board in April last to import dyestuffs, which they badly needed and claimed they could not secure in this country, and they were put off from time to time and could not get a hearing before that War Trade Board until August. Then, when they did get a hearing before a subcommittee, the War Trade Board said: "We admit that you need these dyestuffs and we are going to give you permission to import them, and we will give you a decided answer within 48 hours." I have a complete statement of the entire proceedings here, but I have not time to read it all to you. I am only stating the substance of it. The War Trade Board said: "We are going to permit you to import a six months' supply of these dyestuffs, but we are going to send our own man to Europe to get them." That man has not reported yet. Think of it. Manufacturers of cotton and woolen goods in April last wanting dyestuffs appealed to the War Trade Board, the only power on earth to give them relief, and here it is the 23d day of September and they have heard nothing from them yet and received no dyestuffs. They, the War Trade Board, sent Dr. Herty, whom I know, a most estimable gentleman, over to Switzerland to purchase those dyestuffs. Dr. Herty has not been heard from. When he will be heard from God only knows. Do you believe it is practicable for men with large investments in the manufacture of goods in this country to take orders from abroad or from the people at home to supply millions of dollars' worth of goods, and fool along 5 or 6 months and possibly 10 months with the War Trade Board, or any licensing board, in order to get their raw material? Of course not. That is not practicable. That is not business. If we create this licensing board, you may expect from them the same sort of expedition that we are receiving at the present time from the War Trade Board, which board now has the exclusive power to issue licenses for the importation of dyestuffs.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman statistics to show whether there are enough dyestuffs in Germany to meet the American demand?

Mr. FORDNEY. There are about 900 varieties of essential dyestuffs made in the world. Some 300 of these are the really essential dyestuffs. I have here a statement from the Tariff Board which is a little old, but which is to the point, and it will answer the gentleman's question. The act of September 8, 1916, divided the coal-tar chemicals into three groups:

Group 1, crudes, on the free list.

Group 2, intermediates, dutiable at 15 per cent ad valorem and 2½ cents per pound.

Group 3, finished products, dutiable at 30 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents per pound.

The act of 1916 provided that the duties it imposed should be reduced 20 per cent per year for five years beginning five years from the date of that act.

The bill now before the House retains the three classifications or groups, but proposes an increase of duty on the second group, intermediates, to 40 per cent ad valorem and 6 cents per pound; and on group 3 proposes to increase the duty to 45 per cent ad valorem and 7 cents per pound, and the provision for the reduction of the duty 20 per cent a year for five years is repealed.

According to information from the Tariff Commission, 215 firms, not including coke ovens and gas houses and plants engaged exclusively in manufacture of explosives, reported the production of chemicals derived from coal tar, and the total value of the product is given as follows for the year 1918:

Group 1, crudes	$22,474,000
Group 2, intermediates	123,817,000
Group 3, finished products	83,095,000
Total	229,386,000

Let me say, gentlemen of the committee, that I wired to many of the factories—all that I knew of that are producing dyestuffs—and asked them for the amount of their annual product being turned out and the capital invested. The capital invested is about $135,000,000 to $150,000,000 in the United States. I received replies from 20 out of 34 to whom I telegraphed, showing that their production was $91,782,000. Now, by looking over the record of imports and exports for the fiscal year I find that we imported $8,550,000 worth of dyestuffs the last fiscal year and we exported $16,822,000 worth, very largely to Canada. This exportation of dyestuffs is due very largely to the World War. None could be secured from Germany or Austria-Hungary, nor could many of these dyestuffs be secured from France or Great Britain. The essential varieties of dyestuffs are now made in this country. There are a great many varieties of very high grade dyestuffs used in very limited quantities in this country that we do not make. It is true that because of the extraordinarily high price of dyestuffs during the war many of the dyestuffs that were turned out were of poor quality; but that we can make dyestuffs in this country as good as are made in the world, if you will give us a little time, is a matter about which there is no question, because we have the skill and we have the raw material and we have the money and we have the desire, and all that is necessary is for the Congress of the United States to protect that industry by an adequate import duty.

Mr. WELLING. Is the American manufacturer to-day operating under the German or under his own patents?

Mr. FORDNEY. The manufacturers of this country are operating under their own patents with the exception of those that are authorized to manufacture by the Chemical Foundation Co. That company, as before stated, owns 4,500 patents, and a few of the concerns of this country have been authorized to manufacture under those licenses. That is what I am told, but just how many I do not know.

But before the war the owners of those patents were not compelled to manufacture in this country and they would not let anyone here manufacture. While I am ready to admit that the Chemical Foundation Co. is a monopoly, it is composed of American people who own the patents and they are American citizens, and if we are to have a monopoly, the Lord knows that I would much rather have that monopoly here than to have it abroad. That is the difference between the ownership of these patents now and before the war. I am in favor of their owning them here. I am in favor of changing our patent laws so that if a foreigner obtains a patent in this country he must manufacture in the United States within a given time at least or annul his patent. That is the kind of law that exists in Germany and other European countries, or did before the war. No American could go over there and obtain a patent under their laws unless in a very short time he began to produce the article in that country that granted him the patent.

Now, my friends, according to the information from the Tariff Commission, 176 intermediates were produced in 1918, and 23 others were produced in smaller quantities for sale principally for experimental purposes.

The coal-tar industry has made remarkable progress. The testimony before the committee left no room for doubt as to its inestimable value to the industrial progress of our national welfare

The industry is an asset to national defense. It is of great value to the textile and other industries and a great aid to medical science and to public health. Large numbers of research chemists are engaged, and the possibilities for discovery and progress seem to be without limit. We desire to aid the industry and hope that legislation to that end will be enacted. I believe an adequate tariff is the logical and only logical and effective means of establishing the industry in the United States.

We can not and should not be expected to accomplish in four years that we have engaged in this industry as much as the Germans have accomplished in 40 years' experience in manufacturing chemicals. It is not expected.

In the annual report of the Alien Property Custodian, Mr. Palmer, issued in January last, on page 25, you will there find a statement from him in which he shows the necessity for the protection of that industry in this country. He points out, in substance, as I now remember it, five chemical industries in this country, two of which have been in existence for some time and three started up as new industries. One chemical in particular they were making was oxalic acid, and it sold at 6 cents a pound. When the three new institutions with American capital began operations the price dropped to 4.4 cents a pound, and finally to 2.2 cents a pound. In due time the three new industries went to the wall and closed their doors.

One of the owners of these factories came before our committee and said he was obliged to buy in his own factory at a sheriff's sale. I am a little ahead of my story. When these three institutions closed their doors the price of oxalic acid went back to 7 cents a pound, 1 cent per pound above what it had been selling for before the three factories closed down. When the war broke out the three institutions began operating again, and the Alien Property Custodian then discovered that the two that had remained in operation were German-owned property, branch houses of a parent company in Germany. They had been operating by the support of their industry in Germany from what is known as the "yellow-dog" fund. They were making up their losses out of that fund until they put out of business the American capital invested in the three institutions, and then up went the price again to the American consumer above what it had been before. That was the unfair competition that we had before the war and will have in the future, no matter how high we put the tariff, unless we couple those tariff laws with a just and equitable antidumping law that will not permit them to sell in this country at a less price than they sell at home.

Let me give you another illustration. I have a letter in my office—I am sorry I have not got it here, but I will put it in the RECORD. The Dow Manufacturing Co., of Michigan, has its factory about 22 miles from my home. Mr. Dow is an estimable gentleman and is a dear friend of mine. He told me that he found that for one chemical he was producing from salt brine there was a much better market in Germany than he found in the United States. He sent some man over there, and in a little while he found a market for more than he could produce. He was selling in this country for 37 cents a pound, and he found a market there at 42 cents a pound, and he was making money. One day an old German gentleman came to his office and asked to see him privately. When they had retired to a room he—the German—said, "Mr. Dow, I represent the chemical institutions in Germany. You are selling," as I remember, "bromine in Germany, and I am here to tell you that we want you to get out of Germany or we will destroy you." Mr. Dow was a man of considerable resolution and said, "Go your limit, sir; I am with you." The man replied. "Mr. Dow, we have what we call a yellow-dog fund," and, as I now remember it, he stated that it was $25,000,000. "One half of that money is appropriated by our Government and the other half by manufacturers of Germany, and when we want to turn our guns on an institution in this world and put it out of business, we have that $25,000,000 yellow-dog fund back of us, and we will turn it on you." Mr. Dow said, "Go it, my good fellow, go it." He went away, and in a few days the price of that article in this country dropped from 37 cents a pound to 22 cents a pound. Mr. Dow said that he could not make it for less than 32 cents a pound. He paid no attention to the American market, but kept right on in Germany, and they fought him for three years and a half, and finally laid down their guns and put the price back in this country to 37 cents a pound That is the kind of competition that undervaluation brings to American institutions, and nobody who is not a resolute man with plenty of capital and brains back of him can meet that kind of competition. This antidumping clause and the rates provided for import duties in this bill will protect our people against just such unfair competition, if we can enact it into law. I shall present this antidumping clause to you for your consideration in the very near future.

The demand of the day, as you well know, is to lessen the high cost of living which the late war has saddled upon our country. This proposed licensing system for the importation of dyes is a step in the opposite direction. And, in this connection, you must remember that this commission is not proposed for the purpose of causing competition, obviating hoarding, curbing and preventing unscrupulous and inordinate profits, and other unfair trade practices—the usual excuses advanced to justify the creation of commissions. On the other hand, this proposed dye-licensing commission will operate just the other way from this and will permit, if not actually encourage and stimulate, the existence of all these illegal, unwise, and uneconomic things while at the same time directly serving to unduly harass the business man in his daily transactions.

A second and just as crying a need of the times is the simplification of the American business man's way of doing business. We have already such a complication of laws, rules, bureaus, and commissions that literally no business man knows how he can do business legally and rightfully, and no fair-minded lawyer dares to presume to tell him what the law really is.

What we want now are laws that work equally and automatically, clear and well known to the ordinary business man, so that those who run may read and understand. Let us have no more bureaus, commissions, complexities, delays, and uncertainties, with opportunities for privileges and favoritism. Surely the Federal Trade Commission, the War Trade Board, the Departments of Labor and Commerce, together with the Clayton Act, the Sherman antitrust law, the Lever Act, and other laws are fully sufficient to take care of any situation which may hereafter arise.

There is real danger of a breakdown of our whole industrial and economic system, and chaos threatens, with all these uncertainties, rules, decisions, regulations, provisions, and whatnot, clashing and conflicting and hampering as they are, facing the American business man. Congress, in my humble judgment, should awaken to the situation and insist upon no law in the future which will add to the confusion, but concentrate upon laws which will serve to simplify, clarify, unravel, and condense.

This proposed commission, also, in its practical workings, can not well help but play favorites. It will be a hindrance and a menace to the small manufacturers and the man of little influence and wealth. It is puerile to say that its functions are ministerial. They are clearly discretionary, as shown by the language of the bill itself and the very idea of creating such a commission. The question naturally arises, if the office of the commission is not discretionary, why the necessity for the commission at all? Of course, the commission will act in its discretion in all these matters over which it is given power, and therein lies the great danger.

Mr. Joseph H. Choate, jr., counsel and representative of the Alien Property Custodian's office, in appearing before our committee and testifying on behalf of the establishment of this commission, admits—page 403 of the hearings—as the author of the bill, that the commission will act as a court; and, of course, as a court it will surround and hedge itself in with all the red tape, formalities, rules, and regulations of a court, with consequent uncertainties, delays, and expense inherent in and inseparable from a court.

Then, too, this commission, by the manner of its practice, application, and operation, must, it seems to me, indubitably tend to foster monopoly in the dyestuff industry. The commission may be beautifully and ideally designed and intended, but its effects must tend toward the monopolistic, just as any artificial agent which interferes with the great natural law of supply and demand tends in this direction.

In addition to all these reasons I might enlarge and call your attention again to what you already know, that the establishment of these commissions is an innovation in American institutions, in which there is bound to follow a train of great and increasing evils. Commissions at their best seem to be justified only in war times or some such national crisis. They should be distinctly frowned upon and avoided in normal times.

Gentlemen, in the hearings, on page 260, there are 179 firms protesting against the commission, and all are in favor of adequate protection. On page 327 there are 12 more of the large firms of this country protesting against the creation of this commission, but all are asking for adequate protection to that industry. None of them are manufacturers of dyestuffs. They are users of dyestuffs. The point I want to make is—though I will bow to the will of the majority of this House—that we ought to strike from this bill the licensing feature and adopt a bill with the rate of duties provided for in the bill as now framed and then enact an antidumping clause to protect fully and adequately all institutions engaged in the manufacture of dyestuffs as well as all others.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does my friend still believe that we should have the licensing feature as applied to potash?

Mr. FORDNEY. I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] here is the critical situation on potash: Potash can not be produced in this country as cheaply as it can be abroad. It is a matter of great importance to the agricultural interests of the country that we should have potash at the very lowest possible cost. I am willing to yield, I am willing to subordinate, my views on potash and put a most nominal rate of import duty on potash and place in the Agricultural Department the right to issue a license to import potash when in its judgment the price in this country has gone too high; but that is as far as I can go on the licensing commission.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman favors a licensing system to apply to potash but not to apply to dyestuffs?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not favor it; but I accept it as an absolute necessity, in order to maintain that institution under any kind of a proposition. I would much rather rely on a protective-tariff measure relating to potash-licensing features, but I do not believe we can pass it through this House without the licensing feature coupled with it, for potash can not stand a high tariff.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Referring to the commission, if it has no power it would not mean anything to be in the law. If it has power, authority, it must get that power and authority from some source. Is that source the Government or is it the people who make the appointments?

Mr. FORDNEY. We have aimed in this bill to create that commission by law and to avoid the political effect of the thing.

Mr. FESS. But to whom are they responsible? That is what I want to know.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is a pretty hard question to answer, except to say that they are responsible to the people they represent, who are the manufacturers of dyestuffs and the users of dyestuffs, the great institutions that manufacture cotton, wool, and silk, who appoint them to this commission.

Mr. FESS. Who would have the power to remove them if that power existed?

Mr. FORDNEY. The Congress of the United States, I believe, is the only power. There may be other power in the law that I have overlooked, but the Congress could remove them.

Mr. FESS. Reverting now to the authority, the Constitution plainly states that Congress can confer upon the President the power to make appointments, or upon the heads of departments, but is there any provision whereby you can confer it upon some industrial institution?

Mr. FORDNEY. That brings up a constitutional question in relation to this bill. Not being a lawyer I feel quite incompetent to answer it, but the Congress of the United States in the past has created commissions. Whether those commissions were clothed with the same official power that this bill would confer upon this commission I am unable to state, but it may be possible that it is unconstitutional for the Congress to do this, except in the way provided by the Constitution, permitting the President to name, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the members of the various commissions; but this commission has something to do with affecting the revenues of the Government, and this very moment I have grave doubt that that provision of this bill is constitutional. I am unable to decide that question, however, not being a lawyer——

Mr. FESS. I do not think there is warrant for it in the Constitution.

Mr. FORDNEY. And not having discussed it with some legal talent.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but I have very little time.

Mr. BUTLER. Would the gentleman prefer to have me ask these questions under the five-minute rule? I have some questions that I want to ask at some time.

Mr. FORDNEY. How much time have I consumed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifty minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I can answer the gentleman's questions for two or three minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I have constituents manufacturing wool, worsted goods, cotton goods, and silk, and they are all greatly interested, and some are greatly alarmed about the licensing provision in this bill.

I do not think them selfish in their opposition. There are heavy penalties imposed in this measure on anyone importing dyestuffs without a permit from this commission. But is it not a fact that the commission, if it sees fit, can give you a permit to import such dyestuffs in quantities as you please——

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, undoubtedly it lies in their discretion.

Mr. BUTLER. And is it not within their discretion and power to decline to give it to me?

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely so.

Mr. BUTLER. Might I not be forced to go to you to buy my dyestuffs if I need them? Suppose the commission declines to license me and does license you. You import such products as you see fit, and that compels me to go to you to buy them?

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely; you go to the man importing it, and you can not get it from anybody else except you buy American made. You have no other way than to go to the man who has the license.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand it is mandatory upon the commission to license the importation of a product not made in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no; it is entirely discretionary with the commission.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the language of this bill says that the commission shall issue the license.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me answer that right there. I just stated to you the War Board has been shown it was absolutely necessary for the importation of those dyestuffs requested by a large number of shirt manufacturers and others who went before them on April last and they have not received the dyestuffs yet.

Mr. BUTLER. I know. But I can not import that dyestuff without a permit.

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, then, suppose the commission says the material that I wish to import is made in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. But I say it is not as good as I wish to import.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is just what happened in the case I have cited.

Mr. BUTLER. Therefore they have compelled me to use an article I do not desire to use. It lies in their discretion.

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely discretionary.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield, please?

Mr. FORDNEY. Maybe I am wrong; if I am, I would like to be corrected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee mean to say it is discretionary under this bill for the board to refuse a permit to import dyestuffs which are not made in this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. I say it is absolutely discretionary with them whether they issue a license at all or not, and although the law may say that they shall issue the license for dyestuffs that may not be procured in this country they will do undoubtedly in many instances just what the War Board has done in the case I bring to your attention. The War Board said, "You can get these dyestuffs in this country," and the consumers of dyestuffs said, "We can not," and they went along from April to August before the War Board admitted the dyestuffs could not be obtained in this country. They then said they would issue the license, and they sent a man abroad and they have not gotten them yet, and nearly six months have gone by.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield further. Does the gentleman claim to mean that the powers of the present War board are the powers conferred on this commission by this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know of any greater powers given to this commission than were given to the War Trade Board.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Are not considerable less powers given?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, they are limited to dyestuffs, whereas the War Trade Board is not. That is the only difference.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman mean to say seriously, as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that this commission will have any discretion whatever in reference to the issuance of licenses?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do. I repeat: No matter what we write in the law your commission will have discretionary power to say to you you can get those dyes in this country when they know well you can not do it.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to get down to something specific, because this may involve the use of a plant in my congressional district known as the Aberfoyle Manufacturing Co. Here they use a dyestuff called indanthrene, and they can not use any other dye, because they rely upon fast colors. Suppose they ask a permit to import this, and suppose the commission says that indanthrene is made in this country. My constituent says that it is not made here. The commission replies that it is made here. My constituent says that it is not good quality. The commission says that it is of a good quality, and thus compels my constituent to buy the home product. Have I got that statement down right?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have tried to explain that it is entirely discretionary with them. The War Trade Board said that a number of these articles of dyestuffs could be produced here when the users said they could not, and five months went by before the War Trade Board admitted that those dyestuffs could not be procured in this country. Then they said, "We will let you bring them in"; but they have not brought them in yet. Let me be frank with you, gentlemen. The man who dominated that committee on the War Trade Board was a representative of the Du Ponts, who have $45,000,000 invested in the manufacture of American dyestuffs. He is the fellow who prevented the shirt manufacturers from getting dyestuffs when they asked for them. It makes me provoked when I think that men in the House of Representatives of common sense will listen to such things as that and then try to enact into law a measure that permits that sort of a monopoly to cripple you and your constituents and may not permit you to do business unless you do it with them.

I do not say that because they are capitalists, but I do say, if I have time to read it, that I have evidence to that effect.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will permit, I do not know who is behind it; I will take the gentleman's statement; but I am interested for my constituent. I am interested because of the embarrassment that may occur in the use of his mill. He has apprehended that it will occur. I am somewhat of a tariff man myself. I inherited it from people who believed in it. I do not want you to write something in a tariff bill that I can not vote for.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not write it in there.

Mr. BUTLER. Why did not my friend sign a minority report? It goes to the country that he approves of this.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman just hold his temper? I voted—well, I will not give away information as to what occurred in committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Do not do it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do you consider, from my statement, that I wrote it into the law?

Mr. BUTLER. No. I forgive the gentleman, who is my good friend and in whom I have always confided.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me tell you who the man was that dominated that committee with reference to giving shirt manufacturers the opportunity to import dyestuffs. It was Mr. Poucher, who represented the Du Pont people. He was a German representative at one time, so I am told, now employed by these people who manufactured dyestuffs in this country. Are you going to permit our manufacturers of goods to be dominated by such a power? I am opposed to it. I do not know what the devil you are going to do about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to say that I represent a district that has many manufacturing institutions in it, and I am for a tariff, but I am not for any monopoly side show that is going to take care of any one product.

Mr. FORDNEY. Your factories will operate by the permission of the licensing board if put into this law.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. If A and B are manufacturers of cloth, Mr. A is enabled to get a foreign dye, and therefore makes his output secure. Mr. B applies to the commission and they say, "We can give you a wholly domestic article." Is that the proposition?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Then there is favoritism as to American industries if your bill passes as it is now written?

Mr. FORDNEY. No matter what the law may say about what the duties of the commission may be, every man must admit their power is discretionary; and whatever they do, there is no power on earth to change, except the Congress of the United States. From the commission's decision there is no appeal, except to the courts.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAYTON. I wish the gentleman would make it plain why it was that the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co. objected to a shirt manufacturer having dyes. I never knew they were interested in textiles of any sort whatever. What would be the object, therefore, of that company putting an obstacle in the way of a textile manufacturing company having dyes?

Mr. FORDNEY. It was claimed by their representative that the dyestuffs applied for for import could be made in this country, and the users of dyestuffs insisted it could not be; and I say that after that sort of argument had gone on back and forth from April to August the board admitted the dyestuffs could not be secured in this country, and they have not been secured yet.

Mr. LAYTON. The explanation lies in this fact, that the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co., being engaged in the manufacture of dyes, possibly wanted to give themselves an opportunity to see whether they could work the proposition out or not?

Mr. FORDNEY. I judged from the statement made by the gentleman who gave me this statement that Mr. Poucher was their representative; that they were confronted by Mr. Poucher instead of the War Board itself.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is there evidence of the statement of Mr. Poucher in the hearings?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir; but I have that evidence here. I will let any gentleman read it. It is a very lengthy and complete statement about the proceedings of those gentlemen that appeared before the committee and asked for a hearing and could not get it, and finally when they did get it, they went to the room, and Mr. Poucher stepped in from the side door and took the floor and made a speech and said, "You do not need the dyestuffs you are asking for." Whether it is correct or not I do not know, but one of the gentlemen who was in the room read this statement and said he would make an affidavit in regard to its correctness.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. By whom was the statement made?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would rather not just mention that now. I want you to take it from me that it was a gentleman who was present in the room at the time, making the request for the dyestuffs. And that gentleman and his representatives are dependent now upon the War Trade Board for dyestuff. If it were known who that man is they—the board—might crush him; he might be discriminated against by this board, just as any board might discriminate against the manufacturer if they were displeased with him. And sometimes competition makes people displeased with their neighbors.

I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a more or less enforced absence of five weeks has caused me to overlook many of the details of the prolonged hearings of the Ways and Means Committee with regard to the Longworth dyestuffs bill. But the story is so interesting that perhaps it were better for a brief spell to talk without notes or without attempting to quote from the records.

Dyestuffs are fairly well protected now, so far as tariff duties are concerned. The bill before us proposes to put the rates so high that they will be practically prohibitive with respect to every one of the commodities referred to in section 500. There is very little that we use in the United States in the way of dyestuffs not comprehended in this bill. There may be some things the nomenclature of which does not come within our grasp. Dyestuff terms are peculiar, they are jaw breaking, but they are extremely important when it comes to specifying just what they are and what their effect is with regard to manufactures, with regard to war munitions. During the hearings much was made of the importance of the dyestuff industry to war munitions.

Probably that was the crux of the argument of the proponents of the bill, that this country must keep itself prepared with large dyestuff plants in order to be ready at any time to manufacture war munitions and to put itself, if that were possible, upon a par with Germany, which has been in the lead of us all until recent years in the production of dyestuffs.

German chemistry appears to have been the terror of all those who had to contend with Germany throughout the war in the manufacture of gases, in the manufacture of high explosives. In these and other war munitions the German chemists seemed to have had a hold upon the situation. The German chemists had also gotten well into the industry in the United States, and, if the truth be known, the German chemist is very strong with all the dye manufacturers of the United States to-day.

The statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] a few moments ago in reference to Mr. Poucher is true. Before he became the representative of the Du Ponts, before he became powerful in the organization of what has become known as the American Dyes Institute, a very small aggregation of men engaged in the manufacture of dyes, he was the representative here of one of the greatest of the German concerns, and had been so for many years, and through the instrumentality of that concern had helped to introduce high-grade dyestuffs into the textile industries of the United States.

An effort was made during the war to catch up with the German chemists, and it was more or less successful. Some of us who are older in the service here will recall in the discussion of the Payne bill and the various Underwood bills that much stress was laid upon the upbuilding of the dye industry in the United States and that much depended upon a concern conducted by the Schoelkopf Co. at Buffalo. The demand for a protective tariff was due very largely to a desire to encourage the Schoelkopf Co. There were other manufacturers in the United States, but they were not strong, relatively.

When the war broke out our former dependence upon the German dyestuffs was manifest. We had been importing dyestuffs from Switzerland. We had been importing them from other countries, but principally from Germany and from Switzerland. Germany was a great textile manufacturing country. It was our greatest competitor in the production of hosiery and underwear, although we had to contend very strongly with Great Britain, which was strong in textile manufactures, but not so strong in the manufacture of dyes entering into the textile trade. Many of our laws were intended to protect the manufacturer of the United States not only against the dyestuffs which were raw material entering into the fabric but against the textile product itself, in clothing, in woolens, in worsteds, in cotton, in silk, and other fabrics, in shirtings, underwear, and hosiery. Our mills in the United States could not exist against the competition of Germany and Great Britain and France and Belgium and Italy without protective tariffs.

We endeavored to prove this when the Payne bill was passed. It was denied as a political proposition by those who did not agree with the Republicans in their economic beliefs, but the passage of the Underwood bills eventually proved that protection was necessary. Raw material would go from the United States—raw cotton, for example—into Europe, principally into Germany and Great Britain, and would there be manufactured and dyed and sent back to the United States. And it could be sent back and was sent back as finished product at a cost so far below that of the American cost, considering the higher wages paid here and the greater overhead charges, that it was absolutely necessary to maintain a protective tariff to preserve the industry in the United States.

Textile manufacturers generally depend very largely upon the demand of the people for the styles or colors which they bring out. What is popular this season is not popular next season. The color that is used this year is not popular next year. Preparations must be made months ahead for the distribution of the product of the mill. It may be that the taste of the good women who buy fabrics to work them up into dresses will run to blue or to gray or to polka dot or to any other color or style this year and that color or style will be utterly discarded next year. Color, which attracts the eye, enters very largely into the saleability of the article. Fast colors, of course, are more valuable and important than colors that run and that show up the cheapness of the garment. If you buy a necktie, you want one that holds its color, not one which when you get a little rain upon it or a little perspiration upon it will mark up the white shirt you wear. The Germans have had peculiar facility in preparing fast colors—colors that would hold, that would be just as good when the garment was thrown into the scrap heap, so far as the color itself was concerned, as it was when it first entered into the fabric.

England was not very well fortified in the manufacture of dyestuffs. England had been largely dependent upon the German chemists, just as we had been, but England had a lower wage scale than we had, and, as it was easier to obtain dyes from Germany than it was for the manufacturers of the United States, Great Britain had that advantage over the United States in the matter of overhead, and could make textiles cheaper than we could. On account of the long training and routine service of the workmen, she was able to turn out better goods, sometimes, than were turned out in the United States, because of the changing conditions here.

But the war proved up the necessity of establishing an independent dye output in England, and England proceeded at once after the war was declared in Europe to attempt at least to make herself independent of Germany in this respect. Large manufacturers in England, operating under the board of trade, which is substantially a Government department, were subsidized out of the British treasury and encouraged to establish dye works. It is said that England to-day is fairly independent of Germany, and can take care of her own necessities with reference to dyestuffs.

In the United States we were worse off; but our chemists were energetic. They were ambitious to outwit the Germans and do their part in a patriotic way. They were industrious, and they aided materially in the upbuilding of the industry in the United States. Their advancement in this regard can not be discounted.

The Alien Property Custodian, Francis P. Garvan, successor of A. Mitchell Palmer, the Attorney General, became one of the most active proponents of the dye industry in the United States, and allied himself early with many of the chemists who were encouraging the manufacturers here. I refer to him thus early in these remarks because he is the author of the statement that we had built up the dye industry in the United States during the war until $400,000,000 was invested and until that $400,000,000 capital in dyestuffs served $3,000,000,000 worth of textile business. I shall refer to Mr. Garvan briefly a little later on.

The Schoelkopf concern was the nucleus for the development of such dye industries as grew up here during the war. There were several independent concerns around Newark, N. J. There was a Buffalo plant, and there was one plant down in Tennessee. They began to sell stock. Eventually there was a consolidation of most of those companies, including the Schoelkopf concern, and they enlisted under the banner of the National Aniline & Chemical Co. Then the Du Ponts, who were large manufacturers of powder and high explosives, became interested in the manufacture of dyes, and I think they also began to dispose of stock. The stock of the National Aniline & Chemical Co. was on the market. I think some of it is still upon the market, and it may be that the stock issued by these consolidated companies has something to do with the Garvan estimate of $400,000,000 actually invested in dye enterprises now in the United States. And $400,000,000 invested in the United States, if it be invested, and is a legitimate investment, is about a stand-off for the total amount said to be invested in the chemical industry in Germany. Therefore if the statement of these gentlemen interested in the dye business be true with regard to assets, liabilities, and capital stock, and stock put upon the market, the United States to-day ought to be on even terms with the manufacturers of dyestuffs in Germany, subsidized though they may be, although I doubt if they are.

Now, those of us who are opposing the licensing feature in this bill have no objection whatever to the rates fixed in the Longworth bill, which are in excess of the rates fixed in the existing law, known as the Hill bill when it passed the House. We have no objection whatever to the rates. We believe that these rates are not only sufficiently high to protect everything that is manufactured in the United States in the way of dyestuffs, but that they are positively prohibitive.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is very well acquainted with my constituency, and I want to convey to him the information they have sent to me, that while they fear this licensing provision for reasons that I will endeavor to give a little later on they are perfectly satisfied with the tariff rates suggested in the Longworth bill and ask to have them imposed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that that is the consensus of the judgment of the textile industry of the United States, as I understand it. They do not object to the highest possible tariff rates being levied upon every one of these dyestuffs and these intermediates, but they do resent the notion that they must come to Washington every time they want to buy dyestuffs to get a permit to carry on their ordinary business.

Mr. BUTLER. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, they wish me to state here that just as soon as Americans can produce this material that they use they are ready to buy the American dyestuffs, but up to this time they have not been able to get them and can not get them now, and can not get them for years to come.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's statement is correct. I have a number of constituents who are in exactly the same position as those represented by the gentleman. They can not obtain the particular fast colors that they have been accustomed to use, which are absolutely essential to hold the trade which they now have. In other words, they have designers, they have men who map out styles of garments they are going to put upon the market. They want the colors which they expect will cater to the public taste. They are specialists in their line, and upon their specialities they prosper; but the moment they can not obtain the dyestuffs that will permit them to make good to their customers, then their business leaves them.

Mr. BUTLER. They lose it through competition with others.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They are unable to carry on their ordinary, normal lines of business.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MERRITT. Is the gentleman going to explain the relation of the Chemical Foundation to this before he gets through?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope so. I hope I shall have time to do that. But with respect to the question asked me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] as to whether with this boasted $400,000,000 of capital in the United States we are able to produce dyestuffs here, I have already indicated that that $400,000,000 is said to be about the amount that the Germans have invested in their great enterprises, and that this, if true, would put us on a par so far as capital is concerned.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman doubtless has in his mind this fact: You might have $1,000,000,000 invested in the manufacture of dyes, but if you have not got the brains, if you have not got the chemists, if you have not got the knowledge of occult and secret processes, and of synthetic and analytical chemistry, it can only be developed by long years, and your dollars do not count.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not abash me at all by that statement, because if, having that special knowledge and that occult discernment which the gentleman has indicated, I have built up my business and am entitled to have a return upon my business because I am versed in it I should not be compelled to go to a licensing commission in Washington and lay all my plans before it before I can do business, especially if the commission is made up of my competitors.

Mr. LAYTON. I am not saying that you should.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought the gentleman was criticizing my statement.

Mr. LAYTON. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to protect the man who has the brains and original thought, and the man who has a business of his own, so that he may do business without having to go and lay all the details of it before a business rival, who may happen to be on a board here at Washington, to pass on the question whether he shall have the privilege of obtaining his raw materials. But with respect to the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], here is an extract from the prospectus of the National Aniline & Chemical Co. when it was putting its stock on the market, when it was rather boastful of what he could do after it had absorbed its competitors in the United States and put them into one big consolidated company, and when it so far succeeded that the Du Ponts were the only other large concern able to rival them in the United States. It said then—this was only within a year:

> The Germans will enjoy no supply of raw materials or intermediates which the National Co. does not now possess. With the depreciated currency and the labor unrest in Germany, it is not to be expected that the labor costs of the German manufacturers in the future will be proportionately as low as in the past. With the protective tariff on dyestuffs and the exclusions steps taken by the Alien Property Custodian, the National Co. certainly has no cause to fear German competition for some time to come.

> Under the tariff act of September 8, 1916, all finished dyes are taxed 30 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents a pound specific duty, with a reduction each year after 1921 in the specific duty of 1 cent a pound. Intermediates are taxed under that law 15 per cent ad valorem and 2½ cents a pound specific duty, with a reduction of one-half cent a pound per year after 1921. Raw materials are admitted free of duty. On dyes worth $1 a pound, this duty would amount to 35 cents a pound.

> The Chemical Foundation (Inc.) has been organized by the Alien Property Custodian with a capital stock of $500,000, and has acquired title to about 4,500 patents on processes and products covering all kinds of dyes and other chemicals which were registered in the United States by Germans or other alien enemies. The Chemical Foundation (Inc.) will issue nonexclusive licenses to American manufacturers to use these patents on a moderate royalty basis, and will protect all holders of licenses under these patents from the manufacture in the United States or the importation into the United States of all dyes or other chemicals made in any other country in the world under processes which infringe on the patents to which the Chemical Foundation holds title.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They were selling stock when that prospectus went out, and they were insisting that they had every secret that Germany had, and that with the protection of the Alien Property Custodian, concerning whom I shall speak later, they were prepared to meet all American demands. Yet in spite of that fact and the fact, according to Mr. Garvan, that they and others have $400,000,000 invested, they will want to prevent men doing business in the United States in the ordinary, legitimate, and normal way unless such men come down here to a Government commission, which will be made up very largely of men who have stood for this law, before they can get a permit to go and do business.

Mr. BUTLER. A permit from their rivals in business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. From their rivals in business. That has happened throughout this entire war, and is one of the curses of this commission system, which we can not too speedily abolish in the United States. If the President of the United States were to declare by proclamation, as he is authorized to do in a number of bills which this House has passed, that a state of war with Germany no longer exists, a proclamation he might well issue at the present time, we would not only save this country millions of dollars, but we would wipe out these annoying commissions that are hamstringing business in the United States to-day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman mean that doing business in a "legitimate way" means buying all of our dyes in Germany?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all. That has been another one of the recourses of those who have been advocating this bill—that any man, particularly any Member of the American Congress, who dares to say that an American monopoly will be fostered if you pass a law like this is un-American. It is far afield to suggest any such thing; it is too late to raise that question now. We are entering into competition with the world, and we are going to do business and have competition among ourselves.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Were the statements read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the aniline claims true in fact, or does the gentleman know?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The company put them out. The company is responsible for the statements. But I say to the gentleman—he possibly may not have heard me—that I take that statement and a number of others from the dye propagandists with a grain of salt, as some of them were selling stock to the public. They claimed to be prepared to meet in business any possible German competition, because, as has been stated, with the shield of the Alien Property Custodian thrown around them they would be able to supply the American demands and thus snap their fingers at German competition.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the date of that prospectus?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Because of coming down suddenly this morning, I am unable to locate it now. It was issued within the year, however.

Mr. BUTLER. My constituents say they positively can not buy this material from these people or anywhere else.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then those who issued this prospectus may have fallen down.

Mr. BUTLER. They have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And having fallen down in their promise to give American manufacturers dyestuffs, they now ask for a licensing commission which will enable them to check up every American manufacturer who wants to get any dyestuffs from abroad.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to know from the gentleman what he thinks of the legality and the propriety of having a number of organizations outside of this Congress nominate and create the commission, binding American citizens in the transaction of their business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am very much opposed to it, because it is partial, it is special, it is in the nature of a privilege which ought not to be. This Congress should not delegate powers to a number of voluntary associations to exercise administrative functions which properly belong to an officer of the Government.

Mr. JUUL. Has the gentleman any suggestion to offer how a commission might be created that would be proper, according to his notions?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we want a commission—and I am opposed to all commissions in this connection—you might delegate this power to the Department of Commerce or to one of its bureaus.

Mr. BUTLER. But not to your competitors in business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the objection to it. I say to the gentleman that this present scheme was an afterthought. This bill came before the Ways and Means Committee in more forms than one. It was proposed at first that this commission should have arbitrary power. It was to say whether your constituents coming down from Chester, Pa., seeking a certain license for a certain kind of dyestuff which could not be obtained in the United States should or should not have it. It was to determine rates and prices and quantities, and to have power for a long term of years. You were to be dependent upon it for the price you were going to pay. And that was important, for I suggest now that one of the real reasons for the passage of this bill is to enable those in the United States who have got or expect to get about $10,000,000 worth of contracts for a certain kind of indigo blue to hold the price to 75 cents a pound when it could be had abroad at 13 cents a pound. Pretty good business that, when the commission is friendly.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. My constituents say that it is pretended that every dollar of the stuff is made in the United States and can be sold as made in the United States. My constituents say that it is not the kind of material they can use, because they must guarantee the colors.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The blues go into workingmen's overalls. Suppose the gentleman votes to-day to create a licensing commission which is in favor of holding a particular dyestuff up to $10 a pound in the United States when it can be had in copious quantities in foreign countries at $1 a pound. Is not the gentleman voting against the interests of his constituents?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; but I do not like to vote against a tariff bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then vote to strike out the licensing provision. Does not the gentleman see that a commission which has the power to say whether or not a man shall have a license would be somewhat influential if the foreign price is very low and the American price is inordinately and monopolistically high, and that they could put the gentleman's constituents out of business?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman believe that it is within the bounds of possibility that a commission of consumers of dyes would attempt to hold any dye as high as $10 a pound, or at any such figure?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was using hypothetical figures, although I did in my original remarks, just prior to the question by the gentleman from Ohio, say that I had been informed that a certain indigo blue was being held at 75 cents a pound, whereas it could be secured abroad at 13 cents a pound. You can apply the proportions to higher grades.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has not answered my question, which is, Does the gentleman believe that this would be a commission whose interest it would be to uphold the price of dyes, whereas, as a matter of fact, under the circumstances the majority of the commission would consist of dye users and not dye makers?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I answer the gentleman in this way to best understand the question. It happened coming down on the train from Philadelphia this morning that a gentleman talked with me about another matter, not dyestuffs. He was very much concerned because he had purchased about $15,000 worth of a certain raw material in England and wanted to dispose of it here. He had been told that he would have to come to Washington to get a license, and he presumed that he would have to go to the State Department to do that. I told him I thought that was so; that the War Trade Board, one of "the floating kidneys" of the war administration, had been transferred to the State Department. When I asked him about the material, it developed that it was a drug the output of which is controlled by three large concerns in the United States, which obtain for it $9 an ounce, duty paid. I was informed it could be brought in from England, duty paid, at $7 an ounce. It appeared that the American concerns were interested in the administration here under War Trade Board conditions, and that they also had an agent in England. But the independent buyer was expected to obtain a license to get his goods into this country from those who thus "commissioned" the output. That is substantially the situation with regard to dyestuffs.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has not answered my question. Does the gentleman believe that any commission formed under this act, where six are consumers of dyes and only four manufacturers—that there would be a tendency in that commission to unduly enhance the price of dyes, if it had the power?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is possible.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman think that would be the tendency, to raise the price of dyes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman this—3 of the 11 members of the commission are to come from the American Dyes Institute. How many members are there in the institute?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Fifty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Fifty members, and they have 3 out of the 11 members on this commission. I want the gentleman to hold that for a moment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am holding it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman if the American Dyes Institute is not made up of men interested only in the manufacture of dyes?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Surely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And they are to get three members of this commission?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman familiar with the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I know that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They have seven or eight hundred members, every one of them users of dyes, who must purchase from the 50 members of the American Dyes Institute, and their business amounts to three-quarters of a billion dollars at least.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman is begging the question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They must buy from the members of the commission, who were authorized by the Government to say whether they shall get dyestuffs or not, and at what price, and in what quantity.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman has not answered my question yet. The vote is six to four——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether the Carpet Association of America is on this commission?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It makes no difference——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers is not represented on this commission——

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. But the dye users have 6 out of 10 votes. Is it to the interest of the dye users generally to make the price of dyes as high as possible?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not to the interest of the dye manufacturers to fix the price as high as possible.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is it to the interest of the dye users to have——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not to the interest of the dye user to make the price as high as possible, no.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the only question I asked.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman answer this: In whose interest is this bill being pressed? In the interest of the manufacturer or the dye consumer?

Mr. LONGWORTH. In the interest of the dye manufacturer, of course, and it is to prevent the dye manufacturers of this country from being thrown out of business by German competition.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Who wants the commission, the consumer or the dye manufacturer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will answer that point because it is the only thing the gentleman has to cling to. The same old fear, notwithstanding the boasts that the American chemist now is on a par with the German chemist, with the same amount of capital and business, that we have consolidated our companies, the same old argument to keep up prices in the United States in the interest of the small companies that are now consolidated or dominating the dye industry, is that there will be German competition. Is the gentleman sure that there will not be a fierce British competition in textile manufactures and German textiles because we have not got the dyes to compete with them?

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is this substantial difference, I will say to the gentleman, between the situation to-day and the competition between this country and Germany that there was some time before the war: Before the war be had one dye concern in this country as against the big six of Germany. To-day we have 77 or more different dye producers in this country as against 1 in Germany.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I will ask the gentleman this: He is admitting that the American Dyes Institute, a new concern, dominated almost exclusively by the gentleman to whom Mr. FORDNEY refers, Mr. Poucher, of Du Ponts, was organized solely in the interest of the dye producers, the dye makers, the men who sell to the rest of us. Suppose we grant the extravagant claims of the dye manufacturers that they have $400,000,000 invested, which is questionable, and then we concede that Mr. Garvan, their particular friend, is right when he says the dye users in the United States represent $3,000,000,000. Is it fair to give the 50 Dyes Institute members 3 members of the commission, and the $3,000,000,000 of business only the remaining 7? Is that a fair proportion? I do not think the gentleman can answer that question successfully. That is too unfair a proportion, but that proportion represents the spirit of those who have been thrusting this bill upon the Congress, altering it from month to month, changing its features and its terms until they almost admit in the windup that those of us who oppose the licensing system are right, and that the licensing system is only in the interest of a monopoly and not in the interest of protection to American industry. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether it is not true that the tariff rates fixed in the Longworth bill, according to every witness who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means, are sufficient in the way of protection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They will be sufficient, in my judgment and in the judgment of most of the witnesses before the committee, if in the next two years we can prevent the destruction of the American chemical industry, but they would not be sufficient if multiplied by two, in my judgment, to prevent the present German dumping of dyes in order to put our dye manufacturers out of business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, is it not a fair inference that while these consolidated companies are disposing of their stock, while they are fighting to keep up their rates and retain a war strangle hold upon the manufacturer who is bound to use the dyes if he is going to have a successful business—is it not a fair inference that these men are willing that certain mills shall close and their operations shall cease for want of dyestuffs that American manufacturers do not produce rather than let go this license commission to which they are wedded? As I see it those who want this license system are perfectly willing to permit certain manufacturing establishments to close rather than let them get the raw materials they need to go on with their business. That is a kind of monopoly I do not stand for. I am a protectionist, a reasonably high protectionist, but I do not stand and hope never to stand for a protection which spells monopoly to beat out competition and make inordinate profits for a few.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAYTON. If I apprehend this bill properly the object of it is to establish primarily the dye industry in the United States.

If that is the primary object, what was the object in putting the granting of licenses in the hands of the users of dyes? It seems to me that if you are going to protect the dye industry in the United States, to put the granting of licenses into the hands of those who use the dyes in order to enable them to import vast quantities of the foreign-made dyes, making it possible for them alone to say how much shall be brought in and how little shall be brought in, the licensing system defeats the primary object of the law you are about to enact, unless there is a "nigger in the woodpile."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I really did not get the gentleman's question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will answer the question later. I do not want to take the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I find that the hearings relate to the bills H. R. 2706 and H. R. 6495. Is the present bill a substitute for those?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The present bill is the residuum of a series of bills introduced from time to time. The original bills were much more drastic than this. In the Ways and Means Committee many of the provisions of the licensing system were cut down and cut out. But a skeleton remains, and we are trying to complete the job now by eliminating that skeleton. It ought not to be in the bill. Sufficient protection is permitted to the dyestuff industry and manufactures in the preceding paragraph. The licensing feature is a brand new proposition, tacked upon a tariff bill, something unheard of in economic legislation in the United States except in war times.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Have hearings been held specifically on the bill H. R. 8078?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They were held as we ran along, but several different bills were introduced. And I will tell how some of these new bills came in.

The agitation for this licensing commission apparently did not originate with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], whose name is attached to the bill. It seems to have generated in the office of the Alien Property Custodian. It was unthought of before. It came about substantially in this way: We gave power to the Alien Property Custodian to seize enemy-owned property in the United States. The President had appointed Mr. Palmer, now the Attorney General, to be the Alien Property Custodian. He undertook his work with gusto. He employed attorneys and experts and bookkeepers and investigators ad libitum. He seized German property wherever it was to be found. He seized some property that was not alien property, but belonged to citizens, some of them natives of the United States. There are suits pending with regard to some of these seizures now. He found that some of the properties he took over were tremendously valuable. Indeed, the sum total of all his seizures amounted to approximately a billion dollars. He and his successor, Mr. Garvan, who was prime minister of his administration, laid great store upon the value of the dyestuff industry as it affected the textile industry, and laid heavier stress upon the fact that this dyestuff industry was indispensable for the purpose of prosecuting the war, being intensely patriotic on this subject all the time.

Finally it was discovered that over yonder in the Patent Office there were upward of 4,500 patents taken out by Germans in the regular way under our law, patents lawfully held by them. These the Alien Property Custodian seized. They were patents for the manufacture of about every kind of dyestuffs and intermediate known under the sun. If the Germans had superior knowledge on this subject, they had protected themselves by taking out patents in the United States, and the sum total of their knowledge was in that aggregation of patents over yonder which were protected by our American Patent Office trade-mark. We did not give Mr. Palmer power originally to dispose of property by private sale, but we did in a rider to one of our appropriation bills give him power to sell in certain instances, but to fortify himself he obtained from the President a very remarkable Executive order, which gave him the power to do almost anything he wanted to do, including the disposition of property at private sale, if he saw fit. And he began to sell at private sale. Some very large concerns were sold at private sale, some small ones were sold, both in this country and in our possessions. But when it came to these 4,500 patents over here, one of which alone, I have been informed, is worth a million dollars in royalties, the patent on salvarsan, a drug of very great use now in the Army and very important to the preservation of human life—as to those four thousand five hundred and odd patents, under the Executive order of the President, not signed by the President, but signed individually by Frank K. Polk, who probably had authorization from the President to make an Executive order, were sold at private sale to the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). Now, what was that?

It sounds big. It sounds like the Carnegie Foundation; like the Rockefeller Foundation; it sounds like some great, big philanthropic institution. But whence came this organization? It was born in the office of the Alien Property Custodian. The men who formed it were attached to the Alien Property Custodian's office, men who stood high in New York and other cities, some of them working for the Government for a dollar a year, but obtaining valuable information about alien property during the war as they went along. All patriotic; but they bought those patents for $250,000 at private sale. Nobody else had a chance to bid for them. It was done at the instance of Mr. Palmer, the Alien Property Custodian, under the Executive order of the President, signed by Frank K. Polk. Francis P. Garvan, then the power behind Mr. Palmer and now the Alien Property Custodian, became the president of that corporation. Mr. Joseph H. Choate, an energetic attorney from New York, became general counsel. He had been attached to the Alien Property Custodian's office. And I take my hat off to the activities, to the propaganda work, done by Mr. Garvan and by Mr. Palmer and by Mr. Choate in getting their enterprise before the public. They appeared before manufacturing associations; they went to some of these associations that are named here in the Longworth bill. They made speeches; they talked of the desire to crush the Germans. They told of the terrific influence the German property had exercised in this country; they told how they had seized it; how they proposed to drive the owner of it out; but, with regard to these patents, they said that was a philanthropic proposition——

Mr. BUTLER. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They proposed to conduct that corporation almost as a charity. They proposed to utilize these patents and issue them upon royalties, and get their money back in that way, but they did not propose to make any profits, although they were getting 6 per cent on the investment.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. Is this concern of which the gentleman speaks to be represented on this commission?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; it is not named. But that voluntary association, the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), chartered under the laws of the State of Delaware, had a very close connection with the Federal Trade Commission, which had certain powers granted it by Congress and certain other powers granted to it by the President under Executive order, and they rather swapped their ability to negotiate these patents.

They had their technical and their lawful terms for doing things, but the fact was that the acting president of the Federal Trade Commission during our hearings issued a circular to those who had taken patents on royalty asking whether they preferred to take their leases from the Federal Trade Commission or from the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), under the laws of Delaware, thus offering to deliver this business over to this private corporation, which was not to be conducted for profit, except the 6 per cent.

Now, these gentlemen went broadcast. Mr. Choate was eloquent. If you will read his testimony in the hearings you will find it is more like oratory than it is like evidence. You will find that he is a very able man; but he ran up against a number of snags as he went about, and so did Mr. Garvan. Mr. Choate appeared before a meeting of manufacturers in my city, and he urged the importance of the passage of a law that would protect the American dye manufacturers against the invasion of the German horde, and they cheered, because they believed in that sort of thing, and they signed his petition. When they signed the petition, or found it published down here after it came back to Washington, they found that they had signed for the highest possible tariff rates, which was all right, but that they had also signed for a license commission to cut their own throats and to put themselves in the hands of the men who made the stuff and who would require them to pay the price and get the quantities that the commission would permit them to have. Then they rebelled.

These speeches and this propaganda were carried over New England, and petitions were signed up there, and then came statements and petitions repudiating these clauses in favor of a licensing commission.

I have here a petition signed by hundreds of the leading manufacturers of eastern Pennsylvania, men representing large concerns and vast industrial wealth. It reads:

JULY 3, 1919.

To the CHAIRMAN AND MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned textile manufacturers and textile dyers desire to protest against any legislation having for its purpose the requirement of licenses for the import of dyestuffs. We earnestly desire the development of a complete and independent domestic dye-manufacturing industry, but we believe that can be more certainly and securely attained by a system of protective import duties, antidumping legislation, and the enforcement by the Federal Trade Commission of laws against unfair competition than by any system of restrictive licensing.

License requirements, we believe, will seriously interfere with the operation of domestic industries which require colors not yet produced in the United States, and which will probably not be produced in commercial quantities for some time to come.

A protective tariff will encourage the development of domestic manufacture of these needed dyes but will not prevent nor hamper their importation during the period through which we must wait for the realization of an adequate domestic supply.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not read the names of all these concerns, but they include the biggest in my vicinity.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I would like to know if there are enough dyestuffs of the kind used in manufacturing to-day to do the coloring necessary?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are certain fast dyes that can not yet be produced in the United States.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I mean such as it is. They could furnish dyestuff, but not the fast dyes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These gentlemen of the Chemical Foundation, Inc., who represent this philanthropic concern which took over these 4,500 patents for $250,000 at private sale conducted by the Alien Property Custodian, have possession of the patents which produce the various fast colors that the people of this country want. But evidently they have not been produced here yet, or if produced here, by reason of the combination that has been formed, the price is so high as to be excessive.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Then it will be that they can either furnish them or they will compel the use of inferior dyes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell the House whether he would vote for this bill if there is a license feature in it, or would he vote against it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not vote for the bill if the license feature is in it, because the license feature is an uncalled-for innovation, introduced on a tariff bill. It is a fungus that ought not to be there. Protection is provided in the bill itself to meet the requirements of the manufacturers of dyes in the United States, and, in addition, the War Trade Board, the Federal Trade Commission, and the President's war powers are all in force. They and the Allies' Supreme Council are sufficient to keep out unfair German dyes without creating a new commission to be paid for out of the United States Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I submit herewith protests and resolutions against the licensing feature of the Longworth bill from the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers and from the Carpet Association of America:

PROTEST RESPECTFULLY ADDRESSED TO THE REPRESENTATIVES IN THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS BY THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF HOSIERY AND UNDERWEAR MANUFACTURERS.

THE LONGWORTH BILL (H. R. 8078).

PHILADELPHIA, PA., September 15, 1919.

The National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers respectfully asks your attention to a measure now pending before the House of Representatives, known as the Longworth bill, being H. R. 8078, which will shortly come up for debate and vote, and desires to emphatically and unqualifiedly register its opposition and protest against the provision in said bill to create and set up a so-called dye licensing commission, and hereby requests you most respectfully to vote against this portion of the bill, conformably to resolutions regularly adopted, and which are herewith quoted:

"Resolved, That we, the officers, board of directors, and advisory board of the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers in meeting assembled in Atlantic City, N. J., this 26th day of July, 1919, recommend that adequate protection be given to the dyestuffs industry by a protective tariff, instead by a licensing system.

"Resolved, That we, the Pennsylvania Division of the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers, in meeting assembled this 9th day of August, 1919, in Hamburg, Pa., oppose the passage by Congress of House bill 8078 (the Longworth bill) unless the provision for the creation of a dye licensing commission be eliminated; and

"Resolved, That we recommend that adequate protection be given to the dye industry of the United States by protective tariff instead of a licensing commission."

The following was adopted at a meeting of southern knit goods manufacturers, duly called by the president of the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers, and held at Whittle Springs, near the city of Knoxville, Tenn., on September 9, 1919:

"Whereas industry to be permanent and stable must be free from all abnormal restrictions and governed by the natural law of supply and demand: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we oppose the proposed dye licensing commission as being opposed to all sound principles of business, and especially those principles of American independence in trade upon which our industries have traditionally grown and prospered."

NOTE.—Each of the meetings at which the action above expressed was taken was duly called and was truly representative, in personnel and numbers, of the knitting industry of the United States.

The National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers is heartily in favor of giving full and proper protection to the American dye-manufacturing industry; but it believes that this is amply provided for by the tariff feature of this bill, without adding thereto the secondary and hitherto unheard-of plan of absolutely prohibiting the importation of any dyes into this country unless passed upon previously and allowed by a dye-licensing commission.

Such a commission would be an artificial and unjustifiable restraint upon legitimate business; would increase the cost of doing business; would serve to complicate the methods of doing business which already need simplification; would, it is believed, in its practical workings, lead to favoritism and privileges; be cumbersome, embarrassing, entangling, unsatisfactory, uncertain, disturbing, distressing, and burdensome; cause loss of time and loss of business, and engender business precariousness of various sorts; would open a way for the betrayal of trade secrets, wire pulling, unfair trade practices, the offering of shoddy goods to the public, and would be surrounded by red tape, restrictions, and hamperings of many kinds; would tend inevitably to a monopoly of the American dye industry, all resulting, so far as the user, consumer, and general public are concerned, in trade repression, depression, strangulation, contraction, and cessation. Besides, such a commission would be a decided innovation in normal American business life, without any good and compelling justification being shown theretofore, and the significance and importance of which, with its manifold and potential dangers, is far-reaching, and should not be underestimated.

The National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers is composed of some 800 individuals, firms, and corporations, some engaged in manufacturing and marketing textile goods, such as hosiery, underwear, sweaters, gloves, shawls, etc., and others in making textile machinery. Its members engaged in the manufacture of knit goods employ operatives in factories scattered over the entire United States, having an aggregate capital of hundreds of millions of dollars and paying annually in salaries and wages many millions of dollars. The products of the knitting industry of the United States distributed annually have a value (at the source of production) of more than three-quarters of a billion dollars, and there is disbursed in salaries and wages in excess of $196,500,000 annually.

Hosiery alone, amounting to 73,340,268 pairs, valued at $20,034,064, was exported from the United States during the first seven months of the present year, and it is apparent that the demand for hosiery and all classes of knit goods for export will increase with the gradual restoration of normal markets throughout the world. But, unless the manufacturers in the United States shall be enabled to obtain such colors and shades of dyes as may be required by their customers in foreign markets and which are being offered to their competitors in other countries, they will be seriously interrupted in the expansion of their foreign trade, and will be threatened with disaster to their business if for any reason the outlet for production in excess of domestic requirements suffer interference such as would be invited by the maintaining of a commission with discretionary power to limit importations of dyestuffs as to character or quantity.

If the knitted-goods manufacturers of the United States do not have free access to the colors and shades of dyes produced in other countries, knitted goods manufactured in such countries will be poured into the markets of the United States, in response to demands for dyeing known to be fast, and in colors which are not and for some years may not be obtainable from manufacturers in the United States, the knitting industry being thus threatened with competition at its very doors that would be difficult to meet. Unless a dye commission restricted importations of dyestuffs there would be no occasion for its creation. If it did, the knitting industry would suffer to a greater extent than would the dyestuffs industry were it to depend solely on adequate tariff for protection.

The National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers has submitted its views as to the undsirability of having a dye-licensing commission, by special circular letter to possibly all of its members engaged in the manufacture of knitted goods, and, upon request, to persons, firms, and corporations comprising commercial dyers, and manufacturers of hats and paper and leather products, and other consumers of dyes, numbers of whom, of their own volition, since have filed with the association their disapproval of the proposal for a dye licensing commission, the signatures of protestants being affixed to cards of which the following is a copy:

"VOTE AGAINST COMMISSION INTERFERENCE WITH THE LEGITIMATE BUSINESS PURSUITS OF UNITED STATES TEXTILE MANUFACTURERS.

"I (or) we desire to be recorded as opposing any legislation for creating a dye licensing commission, as provided for in H. R. 8078 (the Longworth bill), believing that there ought to be no restrictions on the purchase of dyestuffs not available from manufacturers in the United States.

"I (or) we believe the United States dyestuff industry ought to be given adequate protection by a protective tariff such as would be designed to safeguard dyes manufactured in the United States from unprofitable competition with foreign-made dyes.

"(Signed) ——— ———.
"(For) ——— ———."

The names of approximately 300 reputable persons, firms, and corporations protesting through the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers against the establishing or creation of a dye-licensing commission are authorized by them to be hereto appended, and are made a part of this protest of the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers, together with an affidavit of the secretary that they are on file in the office of the association.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

C. B. CARTER, Secretary.

[The Carpet Association of America (Inc.). Madison Square Hotel, 37 Madison Avenue, 38 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York, an association of manufacturers, importers, and merchants engaged in the wholesale and retail floor-covering business of America.]

EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES OF A MEETING OF THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE CARPET ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA HELD AT THE CITY OF NEW YORK SEPTEMBER 8, 1919.

The president then directed the attention of the meeting to proposed legislation now pending before Congress relating to the importation of dyes and the protection of American manufacturers of dyestuffs, and recommended that some action be taken giving expression of the attitude of this association with respect to the proposed legislation embodied in House bill 8078.

This was followed by a full and free discussion of the dyestuff situation, and thereon the following resolution was proposed and unanimously approved and adopted:

"Resolved, That the board of governors of the Carpet Association of America hereby expresses its hearty appreciation of the remarkable progress recently made in the manufacture of dyestuffs in this country and its desire to cooperate with American manufacturers in the promotion and continuation of this industry, which has been developed with such laudable energy and skill during the war against Germany.

"Resolved further, That this board records its approval of liberal protective tariff rates upon imported dyes, whether in ad valorem or specific duties, so that this important and successful industry may be fully protected, promoted, and sustained in our country; and commends the protective features provided by the tariff rates in the Longworth bill now pending before Congress.

"Resolved further, That this board views with apprehension the injuries which would undoubtedly result to the floor-covering industry from an an enactment into law of those provisions in House bill 8078 which provides for an embargo against the importation from any country whatsoever of any foreign-made dyes except under a system of restrictive licensing to be controlled by a commission provided for in the bill; and accordingly briefly summarizes the reasons for its emphatic objections to such provisions as follows:

"1. A number of dyes required in floor-covering manufacture are not yet produced in the United States, and until they are produced in adequate amounts they must be imported.

"2. A licensing system must inevitably be attended by delays, complications, and uncertainties which would seriously impede and confuse the floor-covering manufacturers.

"3. Adequate protection to the American manufacturers of dyestuffs is apparently already provided for in the high tariff rates proposed. If they are not adequate, they could be increased.

"4. Under the terms of the peace treaty control of the prices of German products is given to a reparation commission.

"5. The proposed "antidumping" legislation, which is likely to be enacted at the present session of Congress, will provide additional barriers to foreign competition.

"Resolved further, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to appropriate committees of Congress having consideration of the proposed legislation, and that members of this association be requested to communicate with their representatives in the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States urging their assistance in eliminating from the Longworth bill the objectionable features above set forth."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman been granted?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield him eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That makes 38 minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I want to compliment the gentleman who introduced this bill, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], for his very able and complete address yesterday covering this entire question.

I think it will be agreed that practically all of us favor a tariff duty upon dyestuffs, and we are also in favor, I think, of making that duty sufficiently high. We are in favor of a good, liberal duty. We are in favor of the duties carried in this bill. But some of us are opposed to the proposition of a licensing board. We are opposed to that on principle. This bill, I believe, has been carefully drawn, and if these particular paragraphs referring to the licensing board were eliminated, my impression is that the bill would receive very general support in this House.

The war is practically over now, and while licensing boards were tolerated during the war and could be defended during the war, now that we are entering a peace period I do not believe that any licensing board is justifiable. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] have told how the licensing boards worked during the war, and they have explained very thoroughly the great annoyance to business throughout the country occasioned by these various boards.

There is just one feature about these licensing boards which they have not mentioned, and that is the expense that small concerns were sometimes put to in order to present their matters to these boards in Washington. It is well known that in order to get action business concerns were compelled to employ lawyers, usually high-priced lawyers, to get results. Certain lawyers who were thought to have a drag, either with certain boards or otherwise, were employed to present the applications of business concerns. Now, to a big concern it was a trifling matter to hire a lawyer and pay him a good fee, but I have personal knowledge of cases where small concerns were compelled to pay out attorneys' fees that they could not at all afford to pay.

I think we shall all have to agree that the dye used in any garment is simply an incident, so far as cost goes. The question of the price, the value of the dyestuff that will be used in any garment that we are ever likely to buy will never amount to much, and the cost difference between one plan and any other plan would be trifling. But the quality is everything. I do not represent any manufacturers here, and so far as I know there is nobody in my congressional district manufacturing anything that dyes need to be used for. But like many of you sitting here, I represent the ultimate consumer. I represent the ordinary man and the ordinary woman who walk into a retail store to buy goods.

We all know that the prices of the various articles in the stores now are pretty high. It is a rare thing that anybody makes a speech here now when a reference is not made to the high cost of living. I think there are some gentlemen sitting here who wear suits of clothes that cost perhaps as much as $100.

Mr. BUTLER. They ought not to be here.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I really think there are not many. The dye used in a suit of clothes costs very little. I do not think any of us will quibble on the amount of the protection. We are willing to let them have all the protection they need in order to establish this industry. The difference in the cost of any suit of clothes will amount to very little. But if my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] goes down here and pays $50 for a suit of clothes and finds that by reason of poor dyes the suit is no good, then it is a very serious matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will it disturb the gentleman if I make a brief statement?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. No. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. The concern of my constituents is not as to the amount of duty. They are perfectly willing to pay the duty. Their concern is as to the quality of the dyestuffs which they can get.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. My friend is no more concerned about the quality of the dyestuffs than are the farmers and the villagers in my State.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not everyone who wears any sort of material concerned in the stability of the colors, and is it not absolutely necessary that the colors should be fast?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Absolutely necessary. It is a tremendously serious proposition. When I say this to you, gentlemen, I am only telling you what you know already if you have been talking to your wife. I tell you that the prices being charged now for anything that you have to buy in a dry goods store are very high, and after paying a big price you very often, and practically in all cases, get something of little value.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. In just a minute I will. At our house we have a number of articles that Mrs. Young put aside and let me examine, and I brought them down to the committee room and let the members of the committee examine, stating the number of times they had been washed, and showing just exactly what washing did to them. One suit that I did not bring down to the committee room cost a good sum of money. It was purchased and made to order at one of the best stores in Washington, yet the dye ran so badly as to destroy the underwear, and after being worn now occasionally during the past three months, the garment itself from the outside shows that the dyes are not good, and in a short time it will have to be discarded or else the wearer of it will, when going down town, be ashamed of it. I could add to this list many other articles. I am simply mentioning this to show that the quality of the dyestuffs means just as much to a man living 20 miles from the railroad in North Dakota as it does to the man who wrote that letter that the gentleman [Mr. BUTLER] has in his hand.

Mr. BUTLER. And that is the manufacturer himself.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. He can not keep his business if he puts out a poor product.

Mr. BUTLER. He can not.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. A man may have been in business for a hundred years——

Mr. BUTLER. This concern has been established for more than 50 years, and in making this statement I am making it unselfishly. I never was in this mill, but I know where it stands. It has employed from 500 to 1,000 men and women and has always been running for the last 50 years. This man says unless he can get a certain kind of dye, made in a certain way and up to a certain standard, he can not operate his mill. He says that for several years the Americans have promised him dyestuffs, but he can not get them.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. That simply means that a man may have been in business for 50 years, as this man has, or he may have succeeded his father who was in business before him, and his concern may have been running for 100 years and have built up a reputation based on the quality of goods that it has produced, goods that would stand up, which people, when they purchased, found would wear; and that concern, with a reputation which has grown and been built up during a century of good work, can lose that reputation in six months under this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think it is fair to my constituents to compel them to have to come down here to Washington and fondle and kiss and hug any member of any commission in order to be able to do business.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I do not think it is; and I want to say that the people of the United States may have to stand for this, because we may not have enough votes to amend the bill.

It may be that my constituents will have to buy goods dyed with inferior dyes, whether they are of any value or not. No matter how much money it costs, no matter how many suits are destroyed, no matter how many dresses are destroyed, no matter how much good hosiery is destroyed, by the use of poor dyes, it may be that they will have to stand it and these concerns will continue to sell to us, but they can not sell anything in South America in competition with similar goods made in Great Britain or other countries where they have access to good dyes.

It seems to me that this is a plain, everyday, ordinary business proposition and that we can not afford to build up one industry and at the same time destroy a great many others that have much more money invested and which mean more to the success and well-being of our own country.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. I am an inquirer after knowledge. It seems to me that as far as this discussion has gone there is a dispute; one side claims that this commission would prevent the importation of dyes, and therefore prevent the manufacturer from getting what dyes he wants, while the other asserts that they, being manufacturers themselves engaged in the manufacturing business, will open the doors and let all sorts of importations into this country. Now, where is "the nigger in the woodpile"? On the face of it I will admit that if you stand for a licensing system it looks good enough to me. When I see the national association, the American Association of Woolen Manufacturers, the silk associations, the American paper and pulp associations, and all these different concerns asking for it, it seems to me it is a pretty good proposition. Upon the face of it, if you are going have a licensing system, it seems pretty well constituted, but how can there be this contention?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman from North Dakota will permit me, I will say to the gentleman from Delaware that in the hearings before the committee—and I think my friend from North Dakota will agree—both the dye makers and the dye consumers were a unit on the idea that we ought to preserve and build up the industry. Of course the question arose of how it could best be done. The gentleman from Ohio advocates one way and the gentleman from North Dakota does not agree with him. But these parties that ordinarily assume or occupy opposite interests both agree on the idea that the industry ought to be built up because the dye consumers during the war had so much difficulty in getting dyes that they never want to have it occur again. They were willing to consent to the tariff duties, and others were in favor of the licensing system and others objected to it.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from North Dakota yield for a question?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Did these 4,500 patents that were sold to the American company provide for all the kinds and character of dyes which we have been importing from Germany?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think so.

Mr. LAYTON. I think that is an assumption.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota is on the committee and very clear and well informed on this subject. That being the condition, what is the matter with these manufacturers in this country getting all the dyes in sufficient quantities for their purposes?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I do not think there is any reason why they should not buy them where their best judgment indicates.

When we get to the discussion as to the amount of tariff needed we ought to keep in mind that the production costs in Europe have been greatly increased by this war. Every day the news dispatches show that the living cost, the wage cost, the cost of everything that goes into the production of articles abroad, has been increased. When you take that into account, and the increased duty we are proposing in this bill, and the antidumping bill of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], it seems to me that we should be able to keep out enough of the German dyes without resorting to the un-American licensing system.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will yield, this is only providing a method and means whereby the dyes can be manufactured in our own country if the people have the patience and the desire to have it done.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. That is the case. We think it is very dangerous to adopt in time of peace a licensing board. It will throttle and hamper and annoy all the business concerns in this country, and perhaps drive some of them out of business if they happen to be unlucky enough to have created the antagonism or jealousy of members of the board.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Right in that connection the gentleman says that you put in the hands of the licensing board the power to throttle industries in this country. The licensing commission is interested in the development of the dye industry. It does not seem reasonable that parties interested in the development of the dye industry would consent to throttle an industry that uses the dyes.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The gentleman knows that some men who came to Washington during the war were recognized as patriotic, broad-minded gentlemen and who ought not to be expected to let any personal prejudice or animosity or jealousy interfere with their action. Still we know that these things did interfere with their action. I do not believe an American citizen ought to be compelled to crawl in on his stomach and ask permission of any board or commission to do business in the United States. People ought to have the right to do a legitimate business without coming to Washington and asking the permission of anybody.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia is but three hours away from Washington. Boston is somewhat farther off, but it is a large textile center. They are beginning to have large manufacturing industries in South Carolina and Mississippi. Under this licensing system would not the man near by have a decided advantage over the man who is far away?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes; if he lived in Philadelphia he could come to Washington and get back the same day. If he lived in Boston he could come one night and go back the next, and would be away from his business only one day. It would make quite a difference to those living at greater distances.

I want to say this, and I hope if gentlemen do not listen to anything else that I have said they will listen to this: I maintain that there is not a single store in Washington that will guarantee the color of a single article it is selling at this time. There is absolutely not a store of any kind selling anything with color in it that will guarantee it. Here is a card, which is only one of dozens, from Woodward & Lothrop's store, sometimes called the Boston Store, reputed to be one of the best in this city, which says: "We do not guarantee colors owing to the dye situation." And you will find the same thing at the other stores. That is a serious situation.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Is it the gentleman's understanding that this licensing board in this bill will have discretionary power to say who shall receive these licenses?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. If it does not have that discretion, what is the use of having the board at all? If the board has not any power, why do they ask for it? They say it is to keep dyestuffs from coming here from Germany. If that is what it is for, of course they must have discretion. If they have no discretion, then this bill does not do the thing its authors expected it to do.

Mr. BURROUGHS. If I want a license, and come down to the board and make an affidavit to the board that the particular dye I desire is not obtainable in this country, is it the gentleman's understanding that the board has the power to refuse to grant me that license on that showing?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think so. I think they could say, "Mr. BURROUGHS, you can get that dye over here from Mr. Jones." You will say, "Yes; Jones does claim that he makes that same kind of dye, but I do not want to use it, because I have no confidence in it at all." Assuming that you have been in business for 50 years, you ought to know what you want to buy and what you do not want to buy. You do not think Jones has the dye, although Jones says that he has it, but he tips it off to the board, and I am on the board. Jones says to me, "I have got the very dye that BURROUGHS wants." The board has discretion, and can say, "Mr. BURROUGHS, you buy from Jones; you can not buy from anywhere outside of the United States."

Mr. BURROUGHS. More than all that, under this bill as it reads the board would have the further power to refuse me a license unless I could also show that that dye could not be obtained in this country at a reasonable price. I must show to the board that I can not obtain the dye in this country at a reasonable price in order to obtain a license. Is not that right?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think it is up to the gentleman to make that showing, and it will be a matter of discretion with the board as to whether you have made out your case. The discretion rests with them. They can say that you have not made out your case or they can say that you have, and in any case you are at their mercy and there is no appeal.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Is there anything at all in the bill to define what the standard of reasonableness of price is? Is it not left entirely discretionary with the board to determine what is and what is not a reasonable price at which American dye can be obtained?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. That is a matter of discretion with the board.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman, I think, is a little confused when he says that it is anything more than a question of fact as to whether a certain dye may be produced in this country.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think I made that statement plain. Here is a manufacturer. He says that he does make a particular kind of dye that Mr. BURROUGHS wants. Mr. BURROUGHS says, "I have examined those dyes that Jones makes and they do not suit me and I have no confidence in them, and while he claims they are just the quality of dye that I want, just the variety, I have absolutely no confidence in his goods, and I have been in business for 50 years and can not afford to ruin my business by taking those dyes, and I want to get some elsewhere."

Mr. LONGWORTH I know; but does the gentleman contend that a particular dye produced in Germany and the same dye produced in this country are chemically different?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. When you come to that proposition, I do not think that a man who expects to buy dyes in this country is going to settle it by looking in a textbook to see what goes into this dye or that, to determine whether they are the same, because it may be that one concern using the same formula as another may not get the same results. There is an element of skill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The same dye as finally produced must be chemically the same, whether produced here or somewhere else.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Well, personally I would not agree to that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It must be; it has the same chemical substance.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I would not agree to that. Here is a manufacturer who says that he has got the precise thing that Mr. BURROUGHS wants, exactly the same thing being made in Germany, but we can not be sure that it is the same. I think the man who buys this stuff ought to be the final judge. That is the only American way.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me say right there that even the act itself speaks of domestic dye of equal quality.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. BUTLER. I did not mean to provoke discussion; but I would like very much if the gentleman from Ohio would make that clear to my mind. I do not ask him to do it now, but to make a memorandum of it, and I will thank him to explain it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Now, I have used practically all of my time, so I can not yield for further interruptions. I think you will all agree there are factions in practically every organization in the United States, whether it is political or otherwise, and these various men who are selected by these different associations mentioned in the bill will be elected, perhaps, by a majority vote, and each will represent a certain faction, one from this concern and one from another, and when we come down to the three from the American Dyes Institute I know that there are factions in that concern, because I have letters from members of it on both sides of this proposition. So we are sure in getting a board to have it composed of men who do not see alike, who have been elected as representatives, perhaps, of certain cliques or certain factions, who have friends to reward and enemies to punish, and I do not think we can afford to assume that this board is always going to be impartial and prompt to pass on every question on its merits, and therefore I think the general public, which pays the bill—and the bill is pretty big now—has an immense stake in this proposition. A prohibitive tariff has never been a principle of the Republican Party, although its enemies have so claimed. It has never been the principle of any party, so far as I know, in the United States, and when you couple a license proposition with an ordinary tariff bill, such as is being done in this case, it becomes practically a prohibitive tariff. I do not think that the people of this country are going to stand for putting 11 men down at New York with baseball bats to hammer to death any man who tries to import goods into the United States even after paying a good stiff tariff on them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe that ends debate to-day, and I was going to make the motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much more time is left for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has one hour and 24 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. KITCHIN, I believe, wants to use that time another day.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman now desire to submit his motion that the committee rise?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 8078, had come to no resolution thereon.

MEAT PACKERS' PROFITS INVESTIGATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Federal Trade Commission in response to Senate resolution No. 177. It will be noted in the RECORD and lie on the table until the Senator introducing the resolution makes known what he desires to have done with it.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the communication be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is any objection to having any of them printed. I do not see any diagrams.

There being no objection, the communication and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

"SIR: The Federal Trade Commission has the honor to make herewith report to the Senate in the matter of S. Res. 177 (Mr. NORRIS):

"IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
"August 23 (calendar day, September 3), 1919.

"Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, instructed to inform the Senate whether said Federal Trade Commission, prior to July 1, 1918, made a special investigation of the reasonableness of the maximum profit limitations fixed on the meat-packing industry by the Food Administration; and if such investigation was made, that the Federal Trade Commission be instructed to report to the Senate its conclusions and findings based thereon.

"The Federal Trade Commission, by direction of the President, did make such examination, and on June 28, 1918, made report to the President of the United States.

"On July 8, 1918, the Hon. Herbert Hoover, United States Food Administrator, commented upon the report made by the Federal Trade Commission in a letter addressed to the President, together with a covering letter, and on July 20, 1918, the Federal Trade Commission prepared a memorandum on the comments of Mr. Hoover. This latter, prepared in the form of a proposed letter to the President of the United States, was not then sent to the President at that time, but its form was confirmed by the commission and represented the commission's opinion at that time. The letter was not sent to the President at that time, for the reason that its contents were orally discussed, and the matter seemed to be closed.

"At the suggestion of representatives of the Food Administration, the commission is including in this return to the Senate Mr. Hoover's letters of July 8, and in order that the file may be complete, the commission has deemed it proper to include its memorandum of July 20, 1918.

"There are also included three exhibits, being reports independently made by (1) the accountants of the Federal Trade Commission, (2) by the public accounting firm of Perley Morse & Co., New York, certified public accountants, and (3) a report in which both the public accounting firm, the Federal Trade Commission's accountants, and Mr. Walter Y. Durand, a member of the Federal Trade Commission's economic staff, unite. These three exhibits contain the data upon which the report to the President of June 28 was based.

"The report of the Federal Trade Commission to the President, the letters of comment by Mr. Hoover, and the commission's memorandum follow, and to this report are annexed the three exhibits above identified. The report of the Federal Trade Commission to the President is as follows:

"'FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
"'Washington, June 28, 1918.

"'SIR: On May 27, 1918, the President's Committee on Meat Policy in its report to you suggested that the Federal Trade Commission report to you before July 1 on the reasonableness of the present profit regulation of meat-packing companies as imposed by the Food Administration.

"'Immediately upon your direction that this be done, the commission undertook the task, and finds:

"'I. That the maximum profits for the five largest packers under the Food Administration regulations are unreasonably high. These rates of profit are estimated to be from two and one-quarter to three times as great as those earned in the prewar years of 1912, 1913, and 1914.

"'II. That the plan of regulation makes impossible adequate certification; so that to safeguard the public interest the plan should be changed.

"'Supplementing these conclusions, the commission makes the following specific recommendations:

"'(1) That the present aggregation of the business of the packers into classes be discontinued, and for the current year at least the regulation apply a single rate to the licensee's entire business, including foreign business and domestic subsidiaries and affiliations, without segregation or exemption of any kind.

"'(2) That net worth (actual invested capital represented by stock issued and surplus) as of November 1, 1917, be the basis upon which the allowed rate of profit be computed for all packers, large and small, and that gross sales as a basis, as well as "net investment," which now applies only to the five chief packers, be discontinued. "Net investment" including, as it does, borrowed money, may be subject to abuse by reason of excessive borrowing and is a very difficult figure to certify to, while "net worth" is simpler, fairer as between different packers, and more just to the public.

"'(3) That the rate be a sliding scale based on volume in weight of animals slaughtered, thereby stimulating production of meats without directly encouraging expansion into other lines.

"'(4) That the normal rate for the five chief packers be 7 per cent on net worth, with one-half per cent increased allowance for every 10 per cent increase in weight slaughtered and one-half per cent decrease in rate for every 10 per cent decrease in weight slaughtered, the maximum profit allowed not to go above 9 per cent. It is probable that this rule would result in about 8 per cent, which is 1 per cent more than their actual prewar earnings.

"'(5) That the maximum allowed the smaller packers be 9 per cent, increasing on a sliding scale to 11 per cent, but without a decreasing scale.

"'(6) That profits in excess of the prescribed rates be either turned over to the Treasurer of the United States or applied against future Government purchases.

"'(7) That all meat packers, as well as slaughterers, be included within the regulation, except that no licensee doing an annual business of less than $500,000 be subject to Federal limitation of profits. (The minimum limit for Canadian packers is $750,000.)

"'In reaching these conclusions and recommendations the commission has been assisted by a committee of three of its staff, to which committee was assigned the task of collecting the pertinent facts bearing on the situation. The following reports of the committee are inclosed herewith, and in them will be found a further development of the various points already raised:

"'(1) Final report of the committee signed by Messrs. Walter Y. Durand, Stuart Chase, and Perley Morse & Co., certified public accountants.

"'(2) Individual report of Perley Morse & Co.

"'(3) Individual report of Stuart Chase.

"'In connection with these reports the commission has on file supporting data and exhibits (notably a full transcript of hearings in which Mr. Morse examined the officers of the five chief packing companies in regard to the present regulations) and will be glad to submit, on request, such additional material as may be necessary to a more complete understanding of the situation.

"'Very respectfully,

"The letter of Mr. Hoover, commenting on the foregoing, together with Mr. Hoover's covering letter, are as follows:

"'JULY 8, 1918.

"'DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am inclosing you rather a lengthy letter in reply to the Federal Trade Commission's report on the Food Administration maximum profits allowed the packers. I have the feeling that if the Trade Commission report is made public, then this reply, in justice should be given coincident publicity. I do not, however, believe that any useful purpose is served by public ventilation of interdepartmental disagreements as to governmental policy.

"'The matters at issue are matters of considerable importance and principle. If Congress passes sufficiently strong excess profits legislation, it will automatically correct the situation and meet the views of both the Trade Commission and ourselves. If Congress does not do so, I am afraid you will need to make some decision in matters of principle.

"'My proposal is, therefore, that the whole matter shall be laid aside until the action of Congress is determinable. If, however, you think it desirable to have the matter inquired into at once, I would like to suggest that the Federal Trade Commission report, together with the letter which I inclose, should be submitted to some independent person, say Mr. Baruch, or ex-Gov. Stuart, of Virginia, both of whom could advise upon the matters of principle involved, without necessarily entering into details of fact.

"'Yours, faithfully,
"'(Signed) HERBERT HOOVER.

"'JULY 8, 1918.

"'DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I beg to acknowledge the report of the Trade Commission, which you have so kindly forwarded to me, upon the effect of the Food Administration regulation of the packers' profits.

"'I realize fully that in the discussion of this matter any sentence uttered that can be interpreted as in support of profits to the packing industry subjects one to the charge of corrupt influence, and, on the other hand, I recognize equally the easy road to popularity through denunciation of these profits. It is, however, our duty to separate the emotional aspects in these matters from justice and national necessity to secure war results.

"'1. At the initiation of these regulations last October, we called upon the Federal Trade Commission for information and advice, and members of the commission participated in the discussions with the packers which led up to the final regulations. Mr. Davies, who conducted the investigation of the packers and who participated in these discussions, has since made the statement:

"'The 9 per cent limitation of profit on the most efficient meat-packing plants is out of all proportion to the much larger profits made by the relatively similarly efficient steel and copper-producing agencies.

"'During the month of March, when it appeared that the profit limitations set out by the Food Administration were proving to be possibly larger than was anticipated, we requested through you that the Trade Commission should investigate the working of the regulations and advise as to their fairness, and we arranged that they were to take over the auditing of the accounts to determine the accuracy of the packers' profit statements.

"'2. The initial regulations were formulated on the basis that they should limit the maximum percentage or turnover to a figure no greater than the prewar average, with the further limitation that the bulk of the business—that is, the most business—should not earn over 9 per cent, and that the specialty business involving foodstuffs should not earn more than 15 per cent. Certain classes of business were excluded altogether—that is, the businesses in foreign countries and nonfood businesses, such as sporting goods, banks, and manufactures into which foodstuffs did not enter, all these being outside the legal function of the Food Administration. The application of the 9 per cent limit fell upon 75 per cent of the regulated business—the meat business plus transfer value of by-products and 15 per cent limitation applied to the specialty business and completion of by-products. These percentages were computed upon the total capital used by the packer in these businesses, including borrowed money.

"'3. The Trade Commission report advises that the Food Administration should include all businesses (although this is not legally feasible), and that a flat maximum of profits should be imposed of 7 per cent plus 1 per cent additional for each 10 per cent increase in volume of weight of animals killed up to a maximum of 9 per cent. The prospective business during 1918 would probably allow the packers to realize the full 9 per cent. The Trade Commission basis, however, prescribes that borrowed capital should be excluded from calculations of earnings.

"'4. Taking as a basis the tables accompanying the report of the Trade Commission and excluding the nonfood and foreign business, and combining all of the five great packers, we find the following essential figures:

Total investment	$853,219,000
"Net worth"	389,885,000
Consequently borrowed capital	468,334,000
Total estimates of Food Administration maximum profit	87,443,000
Less interest	21,407,000
Net earning	66,036,000

"'The profits are gross, without deduction of taxes, which would amount to about $16,000,000, leaving about $50,000,000 net. The Trade Commission's allowance of 9 per cent on "worth," as applied to the above figure of $389,885,000 would give a net earning of $35,089,650. Whether this is before or after taxes, we do not know, but assume from the text that it is net for dividend purposes. We would submit that the estimated interest figure given in the above table is $2,000,000 less than the actual necessary payment on a 5 per cent basis, and that therefore the Trade Commission's recommendation would call for a reduction in the maximum earned on this class of business of about $29,000,000 without taxes, or about $13,000,000 if their figures are net. This would imply a reduction of about 40 per cent in one case or 20 per cent in the other, and therefore makes it difficult to understand the statement that the Food Administration regulation allows the earning to be from two and one-half to three times as great as normal. This probably arises from the assumption that the Food Administration could control outside profits—which are estimated at $25,000,000 per annum for the five packers.

"'5. The combined five packers will, in 1918, probably kill 12,000,000,000 pounds, live weight, of animals, resulting in 7,000,000,000 pounds of meat products. A profit of 1 cent a pound would be $70,000,000. Therefore the possible profits under the Food Administration regulation are less than 1 cent a pound, and the reduction proposed by the Trade Commission will amount to about one-third of a cent per pound. It is necessary to emphasize this, for the producing public may be misled into the belief that the bare volume in these figures, large as they are, will have actual and tangible results in reducing the cost of living. The fact of the case is that one-third of a cent per pound seldom reflects into realization in the hands of the subsequent distributing trades after the meat has left the packer.

"'6. The Trade Commission has the feeling that there is little or no risk attached to these enterprises, and that therefore their earnings should be reduced to practically the terms of a public utility. We feel that they have overlooked certain great risks. Something like $250,000,000 invested in food stocks are being carried at high prices and would depreciate 30 per cent if communications with Europe were cut off 30 days or if the production program in force should outrun the meat demands and there should be a fall in the animal market. An increased shipping program that would open other food markets to the Allies would have the same effect.

"'7. The Food Administration regulations permit earnings upon borrowed as well as packers' own capital, whereas the Trade Commission proposes that no profits should be allowed on borrowed capital. This appears to us to strike at the base of most business enterprises. As we understand it, a large part of the commerce and trade of the country is founded on the earnings of an excess sum on borrowed capital over the bare interest cost, and we feel that if this principle proposed by the Trade Commission were laid down as a precedent it would produce an absolute state of panic in the United States. This industry must borrow money largely on short-time paper to carry the large reserve stocks now created for the Army and the Allies if they are to be continuously provided for. We are confident if this question were submitted to any group of competent advisers they would affirm that businesses in general, and this business in particular, must earn a profit over and above interest charges on actual capital borrowed.

"'8. The food strategy necessary to the handling of war issues has involved the increase in our exports to the Allies and our Army and Navy by over 250 per cent. In order that we should be prepared for any emergency it has been necessary to call upon the packers to increase their stocks in storage. Furthermore, the program of stimulation of production, particularly the pork so critically needed for war purposes, and the maintenance of a stable minimum price on hogs has involved the packers in much larger stocks than would normally be acquired. All of this has necessitated an increased borrowing on the part of the packers that would not have been called for had they conducted their business in the normal manner. Therefore the compensation of the packers must bear some relation to their borrowed capital.

"'9. We must recognize that this great centralized industry is the cheap producer and that an administrative limitation of maximum profits in certain of their specialty businesses that will reduce them to popular ideas of earnings will throw into the hands of these centralized institutions all the business in these specialties by crowding out high-cost producers, and thus will eventually reduce production or aggrandize monopoly. We can not agree to the answer to this argument in the report as follows:

"'If it appears that the big packers can operate these specialty businesses more effectively than the independents, it is sound war-time efficiency to let them do it. The only danger in the situation would be the failure of the Government to continue its regulation of the packers and their affiliated companies after the war.

"'It is our belief that one of the greatest dangers to the whole of the food trades of the United States is the further expansion of these big packing industries and the elimination of smaller business and individual enterprise. It is not sound war-time efficiency to enable a monstrous growth of this kind to destroy individual enterprise of the United States on the mere hope that regulation of the industry will continue after the war. By that time the competitors will all be dead.

"'10. There is one prime difficulty in all regulation of profits in advance. Such advance regulation must provide for stimulation in production, give an incentive to serve war aims, and must provide sufficiently wide margins to cover all possible risk. If the concern regulated is so fortunate as to come through without incurring losses from the risks the profits may be inordinate. Having narrowed the possible profits of the packer to less than 1 cent a pound in protection to producer and consumer, our point of view was to encourage him to follow the national food strategy at his own risk.

"'11. In calling upon the Trade Commission to reexamine this problem we had in view some attempt to further regulate down the possible maximum profits of the packers.

"'Since that time proposals have been formulated in Congress to enact further strong excess-profits legislation. Such legislation would be much the most satisfactory remedy. The Food Administration regulations having in some degree accomplished stability in the market, having stimulated production and served war ends and eliminated vicious speculation, should be broadly supplemented by tax legislation that would restore to the public any inordinate earnings that might be secured by the more fortunate manufacturers. This method also has the great advantage of equalizing situations between different manufacturers, which is one of the objects sought by the Trade Commission plan.

"'12. An advance profit regulation operates, if too strictly drawn, to curb incentive, to destroy production, and to limit efficiency. The sound method, if possible, is to give a fairly loose profit regulation, sufficiently strict to prevent speculation, stabilize price levels, and then, by taxation, to appropriate to the Government any extraordinary profit that may have arisen. There is also a psychological point of great importance—any given business enterprise would willingly pay in the shape of a tax whatever may have been its extraordinary profits. But if its profits are limited in advance to the same sum the same enterprise will feel it is restricted, unable to protect itself against risks of loss, and the reaction will damage the efficiency and courage in the conduct of this enterprise.

"'In conclusion, we are not in disagreement as to the fact that the pakers may earn too large profits under the regulations. We are in disagreement as to the method of establishing regulation and perhaps as to the actual percentage. On the other hand, we feel that the whole matter can quite well be deferred until the character of the action now being taken by Congress can be determined. If it should prove ineffective to accomplish these ends it would be necessary to revise the regulations, and I will take it up immediately upon my return from Europe.

"'I have written a letter to Senator SIMMONS, at his request, on the whole relation of a properly founded excess-profits tax in its bearing on regulation of industry, which expresses more fully the views which we have formulated in this matter, which I transmit herewith.

"'Yours, faithfully,

"'HERBERT HOOVER.

"'His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
"'The White House.'

"The memorandum of the commission of July 20, 1918, in the form of a letter to the President, but not then sent, is as follows:

"'FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
"'OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN,
"'Washington, July 20, 1919.

"'DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is with reluctance that we address you in the matter of the commission's report to you under date of June 28, 1918, and Mr. Hoover's letters to you apropos that report.

"'It may save your time if we restate briefly the history.

"'I. At Mr. Hoover's request, on March 26, 1918, a commission was appointed by the President to consider the Food Administration's regulation of the meat packers.

"'II. On May 27, 1918, the commission unanimously reported to you.

"'III. Among other suggestions was one that the Federal Trade Commission report to you before July 1, 1918, on the reasonableness of the present profit regulation of the meat packing companies as imposed by the Food Administration.

"'IV. On May 27, 1918, the President approved the report of the commission and directed that this and other work suggested be undertaken by the commission.

"'V. On the same day the Federal Trade Commission was notified of your direction by Mr. Hoover.

"'VI. On June 28, 1918, report was made to you as to the reasonableness of the profit margin under the present regulations. The commission found that the packer's maximum profits were unreasonable and suggested certain modifications of regulation.

"'VII. On July 8, 1918, Mr. Hoover addressed two letters to you concerning the report of the commission. Mr. Hoover's letters seem to revolve around a question of publicity. This is unfortunate. The commission's report made to you at your direction was not made with an eye to public reading, but to the end that your direction, made at Mr. Hoover's request, might be faithfully fulfilled to the best of our ability.

"'We agree that no "useful purpose is served by public ventilation of interdepartmental disagreements." We know of no such a disagreement here. Certain regulations were in effect. It was questioned whether or not they might, in the public interest, be amended. We suggested certain amendments. That seems to end our connection with the matter.

"'We have not suggested that our report, or any part of it, be made public, and it would seem from your letter of July 8 that a confusion arose between our report as to maximum profits, dated June 28, 1918, and that part of our report on the general food investigation having to do with the meat-packing industry made to you under date of July 3. It was this latter report that seemed to be a proper matter to be made public, in that it suggested certain legislation and naturally would be a public document. The report of June 28 on the reasonableness of the maximum profits suggested amendments to regulations, which might be made or rejected by the Food Administration without additional legislation, and hence might properly be a departmental matter and not a public one.

"'The Federal Trade Commission's report on maximum profits was not made in a spirit of criticism, but was made in good faith, and upon invitation. It was desired that it might be helpful. Having been made, its only value consists in what helpfulness may be extracted from it.

"'In the longer of the two letters of July 8 Mr. Hoover says:

"'In calling upon the Trade Commission to reexamine this problem we had in view some attempt to further regulate down the possible maximum profits of the packers.

"'Since that time proposals have been formulated in Congress to enact further strong excess-profits legislation. Such legislation would be much the most satisfactory remedy. * * *

"'It appearing that the report requested is no longer desired, the commission would cheerfully withdraw it, were it not for the fact that two questions have been raised by Mr. Hoover's letters. These questions are of such serious import that we ought not in good conscience be bound by silence.

"'(1) The doctrine is laid down that in computing return borrowed money shall be taken in as invested capital.

"'It is stated in Mr. Hoover's longer letter, on page 6, that the declaration of the principle that borrowed money should not be included as invested capital "would produce an absolute state of panic in the United States"; and, further, it is stated that "if this question were submitted to any group of competent advisers" it would be decided adversely to the position taken by the commission.

"'After diligent inquiry we can find no competent authority in the United States that takes a view contrary to that expressed by the commission. We quote Col. Robert H. Montgomery, pages 572–573, Income Tax Procedure, 1918, a standard and accepted work:

"'Capital in a commercial sense is what remains after debts are provided for. A man with no capital of his own may borrow $1,000 and lose it in his trade or business. He still owes it. As before, he has no capital, and now he does not even have economic capital.

"'Borrowed money is the capital of the lender, not of the borrower. Much has been said in favor of considering borrowed money as invested capital, but the author thinks that the arguments used are fallacious and impracticable. If banks were to consider all deposits invested capital a curious situation would arise. Its depositors might not like the idea.

"'The inclusion of interest as an expense of the business is a sufficient recognition of the use of borrowed money by the borrower.

"'In the case of corporations where the limitation on interest deduction may operate to prevent credit for the full amount paid there is, of course, an injustice, but the remedy is to remove the restriction on the interest allowance, not to consider borrowed money as capital.

"'Being asked if there was any more extensive written authority on this subject, Col. Montgomery has told us that since there is not even a schism on this principle and since it is of universal acceptance, its mere statement was considered by him to be sufficient in his textbook.

"'Col. Montgomery is an attorney, a certified public accountant, a former president of the American Association of Public Accountants, a professor of accounting in Columbia University, and at present the expert adviser of the War Department in such matters, as well as the War Department's representative on the price-fixing committee of the War Industries Board.

"'The second question is raised by the fact that running through both of Mr. Hoover's letters addressed to you under date of July 8 is the thought that legislation providing for stronger excess-profit taxes will "automatically correct the situation and meet the views of both the Federal Trade Commission and ourselves (the Food Administration)."

"'The Federal Trade Commission dissents wholly and entirely from this theory. Before excess-profit taxes may be collected from business concerns excess profits must first be taken from the consuming public or from the Government of the United States in the form of inflated prices. It is not business, but the people, both as consumers and as taxpayers and bond buyers, who provide the money collected indirectly as excess-profit taxes.

"'Our understanding is that the excess-profits tax was not a revenue device primarily, but a device designed, first, to discourage profiteering, and, second, to equalize any inequity which might be worked in the application of general price-fixing rules where, in order to secure production from high-cost concerns, prices had been fixed so high as to give undue profits to low-cost concerns. It is not our idea that prices should be fixed high so as to yield excess-profit taxes, but that excess-profits taxes are collected to prevent fixed prices from yielding confirming earnings in the hands of stockholders.

"'We dissent from the theory of taking back 30 cents or 50 cents or 60 cents or 80 cents from a dollar improperly taken from the people as consumers or from the Government. It is attempting to lift one's self by his boot straps and losing 60 or 40 or 20 per cent of the energy employed. A price structure built upon such a theory as this can not and should not be tolerated by the people of the country.

"'Aside from the impossibility of such a principle viewed from the public standpoint, it has a vicious effect upon business itself. The reflect shows itself in tax evasions and, worst of all, in inviting and encouraging wasteful and extravagant business operations. When a business reaches the point that its excess-profit tax will operate to take away a considerable part of its surplus earnings, it inevitably is tempted and in many, many cases the temptation has proven irresistible to spend extraordinary sums in unnecessary expenditures. These take the form of advertising looking to the building up of present or future good will or of repairs and betterments not presently needed or made with an eye to the future and in anticipation of a return to peace-time basis. Such an expenditure is made on the theory that out of every dollar so spent the Government must contribute unknowingly from 60 to 20 per cent of the cost.

"'Since the Government takes 50 per cent of the meat product of the packers and all the packers' heavy hides, and since the civilian public consumes the remaining 50 per cent of the meat product, we are wholly unable to see that any tax legislation which would cover into the United States Treasury some percentage of excess profit would thereby "restore to the public any inordinate earnings that might be secured."

"'The foregoing is written to you in order that you may know the principles to which we are holding and with the hope that we may be advised if, in your judgment, we are in error. Manifestly, this letter is not written with an idea that it is a public document, and in this connection we would say that we can see no reason for the publication either of our report to you of the maximum profits of the packers under food regulations, or either of Mr. Hoover's letters founded thereon.

"'If, however, the Federal Trade Commission is asked by Congress to make any contribution to the discussion as to excess-profit tax legislation, it will feel constrained to make reply along the lines herein indicated, in which case we will find ourselves not agreeing with the doctrines laid down by Mr. Hoover in his letter to Senator SIMMONS, reference to which he makes in his letter to you. Such a statement on our part, however, will not be made with any idea "that it is a public ventilation of interdepartmental disagreement," but rather the reply that our conscience and our sense of public duty will require us to make.

"'By direction of the commission.

"'Respectfully,

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, requesting Congress to amend the land laws of that Territory, which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

Mr. SWANSON. I present a petition signed by a large number of merchants of Clifton Forge and vicinity, Virginia, favoring a measure to subject the big meat packers to regulation similar to that provided by the Kenyon bill. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Hon. CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned merchants of Clifton Forge and vicinity, favor a measure to subject the big meat packers to regulation similar to that provided by the Kenyon bill. We are opposed to the existing monopoly of meat products, cheese, etc., and we believe that this monopoly should be regulated. We understand that the Kenyon bill provides for Government regulation but not ownership or operation; that it allows the present owners to operate their plants so long as the operations are fair, nondiscriminatory, and competitive; that it provides for the separate operation of stockyards; and that it puts private refrigerator car lines on a common-carrier basis. We desire hereby to withdraw any petitions, letters, or telegrams in opposition to the Kenyon bill to which our names may have been affixed, for the reason that our former action was taken without an understanding of the contents of the bill and at the request of the packers.

CLIFTON FORGE GROCERY CO. (INC.),
B. F. DONOVAN, President and Manager,
(And others).

Mr. SWANSON. I also present a communication from the assistant city attorney of Richmond, Va., inclosing resolutions adopted by sundry citizens of that city requesting the return to this country of the dead bodies of soldiers related to them who were killed in France. I move that the communication and accompanying resolutions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a memorial of the Retail Merchants' Credit Association of Ocala, Fla., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Jones bill, requiring the marking of cost and selling prices of articles of trade, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Outdoor Art League, of San Francisco, Calif., praying that the name of the Panama Canal be changed to the Roosevelt Canal, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3037) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer free of charge certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to the Department of Agriculture, Post Office Department, Navy Department, and the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service, and certain other surplus property to the Department of Agriculture, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 220) thereon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2890) to provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 219) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2454) for the relief of certain members of the Flathead Nation of Indians, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 218) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and by unanimous consent the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 3071) granting an increase of pension to Adelaide V. Lamson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3072) granting a pension to Francis Stone (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 3073) for the relief of Henry Phillips, sr. (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3074) to provide for the award of military medals to persons receiving citations or letters of commendation for gallantry in action; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 3075) for the relief of Ivy L. Merrill; to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $9,200 to increase the compensation of lithographers, lithographic draftsmen, transferers, lithographic pressmen, helpers, etc., in the Coast and Geodetic Survey, intended to be proposed by him to the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I present and send to the desk a telegram with regard to the league of nations which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the Secretary read as follows:

MARSHALLTOWN, IOWA, September 20, 1919.

Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
Washington, D. C.:

To the Hon. Senators CUMMINS and KENYON, from the Frank Lewis Glick Post, No. 46, American Legion of Iowa: The Frank Lewis Glick Post, No. 46, of the American Legion, of Marshalltown, Iowa, consisting of 406 returned war veterans in assembly convened directs that the following resolution be transmitted to you: Be it

"Resolved, That we are not in favor of the peace treaty and the league of nations as it now stands. We support certain reservations to these documents. In particular we enumerate the following: First, our opposition to any treaty requiring American soldiers to perform any service except under direction of the United States Government only; second, the Government should not obligate itself to any other nation to perform any military or other service; third, we strongly urge the immediate return of all United States soldiers doing service on foreign soil; fourth, every particular of the Monroe doctrine must be retained and protected."

O. H. ALBEE,
R. C. MOLLISON,
H. H. CRANEY,
Committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a distinguished lawyer and eminent citizen of my State, a former judge, has written an article which has been published in the New York American, which also relates to the treaty with Germany. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York American, Sept. 7, 1919.]

"MID-WEST VIEW IS OPPOSED TO THE 'LEAGUE OF NATIONS'—'IMPOSSIBLE UNDER STATE OF CIVILIZATION AND VARIETY OF HUMAN INTERESTS IN THE WORLD'—COVENANTS LAST ONLY BY WILL OF THE PEOPLE—'WE HAVE IN OUR OWN LAND MORE CONCERN ABOUT OUR OWN LIBERTIES AND OUR LAW-ABIDING PEOPLE THAN WE CAN CONSISTENTLY HANDLE'—PILGRIM FATHERS LEFT THEIR NATIVE SHORES TO AVOID COMPLICATIONS, ALLIANCES, AND INTRIGUES OF THEIR PEOPLE, AND THEY GREW AND PROSPERED.

(By Ex-Judge Felix T. Hughes.)

"I am opposed to the league of nations, which is now pending for ratification by the Senate.

"I am opposed to it because it is impossible under the state of civilization and the variety of human interests in the world; on account of climate, race, and civilization. A league is a 'treaty, alliance, or confederation between two or more sovereigns or governments for mutual aid and defense.' Leagues may be, and generally are, 'offensive and defensive.' The former when they unite in attacking a common enemy; and defensive when the parties agree to assist each other in defense against a common enemy.

"SUPREME COURT VIEW.

"Our late Mr. Justice Miller, of the Federal Supreme Court, said in 112 United States, pages 580 to 598:

"'A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations. It depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the interest and the honor of the Governments which are parties to it. If these fail its infraction becomes the subject of international negotiations and reclamations so far as the injured party chooses to seek redress, which may in the end be enforced by actual war. It is obvious that with all this the judicial courts have nothing to do and give no redress.'

"So that every treaty or league contemplates a possibility of war, because the league or treaty has no internal power, as among the contracting nations, of enforcing its agreements.

"Treaties or leagues of nations should have no other object or purpose in view than to promote peaceful, social, and commercial relations between them where such relations are mutual and the parties feel that their respective interests are indentical upon the given question in issue.

"The interest of the respective nations depends on the state of their civilization and commercial and social attainments at the time, and these may be and have always been so divergent and ever changing that no one rule of action can be laid down to meet such divergency and necessities of 'all the people all the time.'

"SOME BROKEN COVENANTS.

"One would think from Mr. Wilson's '14 points' that the only thing for the nations of the world to do is to step up now and sign their names to this paper, then wars will be forgotten. But even the covenant of the Garden was broken when Eve got her eye on that apple. Then Cain and Abel broke their brotherly league and the one killed the other.

"The human race is known only through its wars. The people who do not fight for their existence only await the time when they are consumed by the ones who do. Korea and China are examples.

"All leagues or covenants last only so long as the interest, thoughts, and wishes of the people continue as of the time of the making thereof. Even the Holy League of 1576 failed of its purpose, and possibly because of inherent differences in the application of religion to the human being.

"WORLD PEACE FAR OFF.

"Nothing has ever stayed and made permanent any order, league, or covenant designed for the future; and nothing can or will ever be made to stand any longer than is permitted by the changing conditions of the human families requiring different rules and obligations of the one people to the other. I may say that the world to-day is no nearer the peace question than it was before this league of nations was proposed, and when the pipe dream of the '14 points' came under the fire of human intellect and human necessities it was found as varied as the people of the world.

"The power to enforce the peace of the world rested at the close of this war in the great Allies; and the power was the power of the sword, and it was enforced by means of death and destruction. When the Central Powers were destroyed and on their knees, it was sufficient for these allied powers to fix the penalty and put their finger to the place and tell the Kaiser and his allies to sign there.

"As for the League to Enforce Peace, there is no supreme power in a league to enforce its own decrees. They can only exist when the conditions, as of the time when made, continue and remain the same. Differences will arise from intellectual advancement, physical conditions, temperature, and localities, and as these grow the differences of the original league widen until a split or separation must come.

"'A League to Enforce Peace!' The very thought includes war, made by this league against any country or people whose changes of necessities and thought differ from that of the original league.

"There may be pact in the peace but not peace in the pact. Our love of peace comes from the horrors of war, and history is the best pact. All there is in the pact is that we sign a bond not to fight again. Yet if somebody seeks a fight we will fight him.

"Since there are no means of maintaining a league to enforce peace but war, how can such a league be maintained without war? The only league worth a cent is the one in the mind and soul of the individual or nation that has seen the horrors of war and felt and enjoyed the blessings of peace.

"One may say that most likely there would be no such differences arising in the league as would require any serious war or trouble. But that is purely imaginary. The split may grow until the minds of the contracting parties are equal or nearly so. And then comes the 'tug of war.'

"WORLD IS WORSE OFF.

"The right thing for the allied nations to have done was to dictate terms of peace which the Central Powers must accept, and thereby end the war. Then we could have talked for the years to come about means to prevent another war. But no, the whole thing must be settled now and forever, before the terms of capitulation of the Central Powers could be written.

"And with all these months of struggle and indecision the world is in a thousand times worse condition to-day than it was in November last when the armistice was signed. And we find that, as to this Nation's wants, instead of the peace pact ending wars we are 'just beginning to fight.'

"We have in our own land more concern about our own liberties and our law-abiding people than we can handle, without running after those of Europe, Asia, and Africa. This country has been opposed to leagues or general peace treaties with the countries of Europe from the beginning. Our Pilgrim Fathers left their native shores to avoid the complications, alliances, and intrigues of their people, and they lived and prospered under their own vine and fig tree and grew until they felt they could stand alone; and they did, through revolution, thereby obtaining independence.

"THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

"Washington, the Father of his Country, left in his Farewell Address the instruction to avoid entanglements and alliances with other countries, and it worked so well that President Monroe affirmed the doctrine and put up the big sign 'Monroe doctrine' for Americans. And under this big sign we have marched to our present human greatness.

"Yet, just now, in the youth of this greatness, we are asked to take down this sign, burn it, and go into the big mix-up of the world; in fact, to put ourselves into this world court to abide any decrees it may make, regardless of the wish of this Nation or that.

"Now, this doctrine, as foreshadowed by Washington in his Farewell Address, had been tried and tested down to the presidency of James Monroe, from 1821 to 1825, and when it had been seen that the Holy Alliance was attempting to subjugate the Spanish-American States which had revolted, Monroe said that any attempt of the 'allied powers to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere was dangerous to our peace and safety.'

"PUTS LEGAL PHASE TO TEST.

"Just how Mr. Wilson can say that the allied powers which he proposes can extend their system to not any but all portions of this hemisphere without danger puts the legal phase of this question to the test. In fact, his proposition, as I view it, is simply absurd, and made for personal or ambitious reasons of his own.

"The very thought simply wipes out the whole Monroe doctrine and puts us back precisely where we were before it became the law and policy of this country. 'With our backs to the wall' and the 'Spirit of '76,' we say, 'You shall not pass.'

"As Washington, Monroe, and all our true, great American people down to the present time have stood aloof from the European entanglements and alliances, why not go along like them?

"There is no question but that a league or treaty between nations, and especially the one that is proposed, is supreme over and above our Constitution and laws, and when we have signed and become a party to this constitution of the world, we are but a member and not an independent Nation, and we must take the judgment of this World Congress which is to pass upon our rights the same as those of other people, whether enlightened or savage.

"OVERRIDES CONSTITUTION.

"A constitution which provides for making treaties with other nations does admit, and the courts so decide, that this treaty when made is superior to the constitution. Or in other words, the constitution has in fact been so far amended. When our Constitution is antagonistic to that of the world constitution, we take our chances of seeing the world decide against us through the supreme court of the world instead of our own Supreme Court and our own people.

"I am one of those who believe that the time has not come when we are ready to submit our Constitution and the liberties of our fathers to the decision of a foreign court.

"We are now listening to the story that we shall lose the commerce of Europe if we do not hurry up and sign; and, lastly, if we do not hurry up and sign we shall not get a part of the spoils that are now to be distributed as the trophies of war in the old country. Such stuff to cast before an American citizen!

"This country has gotten along very well without the spoils of Europe and the trophies of war, and we shall have the other countries begging at our feet for the means of life rather than be begging them for the little pittance of spoils coming to us as a party to the war.

"SENATE CONSENT NEEDED.

"Treaties under our Constitution can only be made by the President 'by and with the advice and consent of the Senate,' and this advice and consent is so important that it takes a two-thirds vote of the Senate before it becomes effective.

"Did the Senate advise Mr. Wilson to make the treaty or league in controversy? No; on the contrary, he conceived the thought out of his own personal mind. He left his country, in a sense, without the knowledge of the Senate, a thing without a precedent, and at a time when it was most important for him to stay in this country.

"When reminded of this important duty, his only answer was that now, when telegraphy and wireless are so quick and great, he could handle Congress as well in Paris as in Washington. That was when a friendly Congress was in session. But when March 4 came, and a different Congress was to convene, he said he would not convene it because he would be away on his important mission and Congress could not run without his presence in Washington.

"Was he, in all this, seeking the advice of the Senate as to this league or consulting his own personal interest in determining the interest of more than a hundred millions of people?

"ORIGIN OF A TREATY.

"'A treaty must come from the people as represented in the Senate, and when the people feel the necessity of such a treaty, and what it should be, the Senate advises the President what the people desire in that regard, and authorizes him, as their contracting agent, to enter into such an agreement and get the signatures thereto. Then, when all is done, the paper must come back to the Senate for ratification by a two-thirds vote thereof before it can become effective.' (Butler, Treaty-Making Power, S. 463–183, U. S. 176.)

"France asks that the Allies especially agree over their signatures to go to her military aid in case Germany should undertake another invasion of her soil. This is another clause to 'enforce peace' instead of the love of peace.

"I should be in favor of the advanced and independent nations of the earth in some formal way pledging the honor of the respective countries to do all in their power to prevent war and maintain peace. This can be done without the sacrifice of the principles and constitutions of such countries, and will preserve their full independence to act in all matters which might arise concerning their rights and privileges. For that matter, a court of arbitration could be established, and differences arising between the nations so agreeing could be adjusted in the usual way. The penalty of refusal to abide by such arbitration would be the horror of war.

"The proposed league of nations is nothing more than a consolidation or trust of all the independent nations of the world into one grand combination, with executive legislation and judicial powers.

"This power will deal with the individual nations just as a great consolidated corporation would deal with its stockholders, the stockholders in the instant case being the nations so entering the league.

"In fact, this country of ours will have very little to say about its internal or external affairs and can only appeal to the league powers, and abide by the decision reached. Where is the end? And where do our Declaration of Independence, our Bill of Rights, our Monroe doctrine, our Constitution, our flag, our land of liberty, the home of the oppressed of all nations, come in?

"We have done well so far. Our very independence and our great power were the signals to victory in this war.

"The 'big four,' which assume the duties of executive council of this world combination, have not been able so far to satisfy themselves in the partitioning of the world proposition. One of the fourteen points was intended to preserve the boundary lines of existing countries, but among the first things done was to establish some new countries out of the borders of the old, and define their rights and powers. In this way the peace of the world was to be enforced. But no sooner had this general claim been made than we were called upon to aid existing countries—England, for instance, in retaining her boundary over Ireland and her internal affairs here at the threshold. Instead of this point enforcing peace, it enforces war, and we are now experiencing the entanglements of these people in our own land.

"We are discovering many germs of war instead of peace. It all goes to prove the utter futility of this league. Our fathers and mothers are never going to consent to any league, combination, or authority, composed chiefly of the powers of Europe, to say: 'This American boy or that must leave his home, family, and country and sacrifice his life on the bloody field of battle in Europe, Asia, or Africa on the order of a foreign council.'

"We can better serve all the people by first serving our own. Let every other country be likewise. Let's go the old way and never lower the old flag one inch for anybody."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, following the telegram which has just been read, I wish to read a letter which I have received from the president of the University of Cincinnati, Ohio, Dr. Charles W. Dabney, as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF CINCINNATI.
September 22, 1919.

Senator JOHN S. WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: With the exception of a few extreme partisans, everyone I know is in favor of the immediate ratification of both the league of nations and the treaty of peace without reservations or interpretations. School and college men are almost unanimous for it; the vast majority of the church people are for it.

As I meet them, the people of the country are becoming more and more indignant at this delay. They recognize that the documents may not be perfect; but they all say ratify now and amend them afterwards. If the league council refuses to accept reasonable amendments, such as may be required to assure the preservation of our American interests—I do not believe they will be required—then we can get out of it.

This league presents the idea for which the Christian world has been working and praying for centuries. To lose this opportunity to put this idea into practice would be the crime of the ages.

Sincerely, yours, CHARLES WM. DABNEY.

In connection with that Mr. Dabney sends me an address which was delivered by him and which is entitled "The world peace: How shall we keep it?" It is very short; it is the address of a man whom I have known for nearly half a century, I reckon; a man of fine learning, magnificent sense, and of the loftiest and best possible feeling. I ask unanimous consent that the address be inserted in the RECORD, to follow immediately after the letter which I have just read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The address is as follows:

THE WORLD PEACE—HOW SHALL WE KEEP IT?

[By Charles William Dabney.]

"Peace has come, but to what a world of waste and woe! Ten million men killed at the front and countless more dead in the home lands. Economically Europe is in ruins; industrially it is paralyzed; financially it is bankrupt; politically it is in anarchy. Famine threatens the whole of the Continent; terrorism blazes over all. What good is peace in such a world? Is it indeed peace, or is it death, that has overtaken the world?

"Nor are these terrible consequences confined to the conquered peoples. The neutral nations are only less hungry and the problems facing the victorious Allies are equally large. The sudden reversal of the tremendous enginery of war and its direction into peace-time production, the return of the men to their employment, the vast work of reconstruction and of the restoration of the rights of individuals, railroads, and corporations, sacrificed to the emergency, and the confusion of a society hurriedly changing back to the old basis—all these things call for great wisdom and devotion, as well as for prodigious energy and expenditure. The question of the hour is, Can conquered Europe be brought to order? Having won peace, can we keep it? The organization for war was an easy business compared with this task of organizing the world for peace. Such a time is one for sincere thinking and earnest acting; for broad statesmanship, not for narrow partisanship. The rebuilding of European institutions is the hardest task ever set for the minds of men, and their minds must not be poisoned either by national jealousies at Versailles or partisan demands at Washington.

"Called upon to share in the work of restoring civilization, we must ascend the hill of vision and try to get a new view; we must cease to think in terms of countries and continents and endeavor to see the world as one whole. The Old World, with its dynasties and its despots, its kings and its kaisers, its secret diplomacies and competitive armaments—this Old World, with its thousand years of wrongs, is dead. It cost 10,000,000 of the lives of its best men, but it is dead at last. The dynasties are overthrown, the war lords are vanquished, the kaisers have fled.

"The new world that lies before us is a world with a new spirit; it is a world founded upon a new concept of government; it is the concept that the nations are not, as has been held for a thousand years, a collection of natural enemies, but a society of friends; it is the belief that cooperative nationalism, not competitive nationalism, shall be the principle of the future; it is the faith that justice, not force, that the moral law, not the law of the sword, is to be the rule of the new world's life. The 'balance of power,' a concert of nations armed to the teeth against their own destruction, is forever destroyed, and a 'community of power,' a league of nations organized to protect the existence of all is, we hope, to be established. In this sense the round earth is henceforth to be the unit of government.

"How shall we keep the peace? There is danger that after spending millions of lives and billions of money to win the peace we shall now go to sleep with the idea that peace will keep itself. Let us not deceive ourselves. Look at Russia and Germany to-day. Peace will not be preserved a single decade under the old plan. By what plan, then, by what law shall we preserve this peace? By the same plan, by the same law by which we won it—by the law of right. This is the teaching of all history, as well as of this war.

"The chronicles of the nations are full of tragedies showing the necessity of punishment to teach men the duty of right doing in national as well as in personal affairs. But men refused to learn the lesson. So in these last years the world had again to be taught that 'God has made all the nations of the earth of one people to dwell on the face of the earth,' not in perpetual fear of one another, but in constant helpfulness to one another. This latest and greatest catastrophe teaches us that moral ideals are more powerful than any other force in the universe. These are the lessons of the war.

"There are some great lessons for the nations in this peace treaty, too—some most surprising lessons! For years men have thought that certain wrongs would stand forever unrebuked and unchanged. The doctrine that might made right seemed established by history. Who of us, for example, thought 10 years ago that millions of Americans would ever cross the seas to help the people of Lafayette recover their lost Provinces? As President Poincare said in his address to President Wilson on the Fourth of July: Who foresaw or could foresee 'two people communing together in the memory of the ancient ideals which won for America her liberty, and in the hope of an immediate victory which would assure to the world a just and fecund peace, based on the right of nations and fortified by the approbation of the human conscience?' And we may add: Who in the last 50 years believed that the rape of North Schleswig would ever be atoned for? Who, in the last hundred years, knowing the vast complications, ever dreamed that Americans would take part in a war which should redeem the countrymen of Kosciusko and reunite partitioned Poland? And who, in the last hundred and fifty years, would have thought that the territory captured by Frederick the Great in his raid on Silesia in 1740, the model of all the later raids of his successors, would have been restored in 1919? What modern prophet foresaw these things? They were hoped for by French and Poles, but, among outside peoples, who ever thought them possible? But they are all done. These wrongs are righted. The 'captives of the mighty have been taken away and the prey of the terrible delivered.'

"But the greatest lesson of all has just been given us. Witness the final act of this war drama being acted at Versailles to-day. Consider first the setting of this wonderful international drama. The Germans are back at Versailles after 48 years! The wheel of time has indeed brought many strange happenings to light, but never anything like the irony of judgment that brought the Germans back to the Hall of Mirrors. If by looking into those mirrors we could see what was happening in 1871, what would we see? We would see a German army in France and in captured Paris. We would see a defeated people surrendering to German force. We would see a man of 'blood and iron' dictating to the President of that people the most vindictive peace that ever closed a war. We would see the flower of the German Army and a glorious company of princes gathered in pride and power to found, in this very Hall of Mirrors, the German Empire, which was to be the curse of the world.

"Now behold another scene. 'It is Wednesday, the 7th of May, 1919. The plenipotentiaries of the Empire of Germany are at Versailles, in the city where on the 18th of January, 1871, was built the German Empire on the ruins of France. It is exactly the anniversary of the sinking of the Lusitania. As for Versailles, we have the proof that she was to have been destroyed to terrify Paris, as they destroyed Louvain to terrify Brussels. To-day the successors of the invaders of 1914 are seated, vanquished, before our representatives, to hear the terms dictated by their conquerors, the successors of those who were to be crushed in 15 days.'

"Now, by what law do such things happen? Is it by a law of the nations or by some kind of cosmic law that they occur? Go back to January 18, 1871, when the German Empire was proclaimed at Versailles, and get the answer. The chief actors in that scene will give it to you. There, in this very peace hall, was held, preparatory to the proclamation of the Empire, a religious service, in which these Germans bowed down to God and William I, and there was chosen for the German preacher a text the words of which must live as a mark of the cynical depths of cruelty in which this empire was conceived and born. The official court preacher was assigned those terrible words that marked the doom of Belshazzar—'Mene, mene, tekel, Eupharsin.' 'God hath remembered thy kingdom and finished it. Thou art weighed in the balance and art found wanting. Thy kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians'—and addressed his sermon to France and her last Napoleon. There is the answer. God! 'God hath remembered.'

"Where less than half a century ago victorious Germans dictated the terms to France the representatives of vanquished Germany have now heard the sentence passed upon their nation. When they look upon those mirrored walls this week they will read there the same fateful words they wrote for the French in 1871. Has the history of the nations any parallel to this moral drama?

"There is a lesson, too, for all the nations in the memory of these events. It is not for the Germans only, it is a sharp warning to all nations. The one certain lesson of the past is that for every such deed and act of oppression the price is to be paid at last. Nations, like individual men, pay the penalty for all acts of lust and cruelty.

"What scenes and lessons! What do they mean for the future? Behind us is the greatest war in history; in front of us the peace for which we have been waiting 2,000 years. With no unreasonable pride of power, with no incurable hate and no insatiable craving for revenge in their hearts, all the peoples are longing for this everlasting peace. With the wreckage of the past they have cast these things behind them, and they long with an unalterable passion to be allowed to live in peace, in the peace that holds in its lap the prosperity and happiness of their children. It is not their will that this peace shall be poisoned with the spirit of revenge they have sought to destroy; but it is their unalterable will that this victory shall go hand in hand with justice and reparation for Servia, Belgium, France, and all the outraged peoples. If they willed less than this, the blood of their martyrs would cry out against them from the ground.

"What now is our part in this peace? We entered the war not for conquest but for conscience; not for selfish but for righteous ends. We entered the war to overthrow the military autocrats, for the rights of the weak and helpless, and for the little peoples of the earth, that they might continue to plow and sow and reap in their peaceful valleys, singing their songs of by-gone glories undisturbed and unmolested. We entered the war for the freedom and safety of the seas, for the sanctity of treaties and covenants, for the cause of world democracy, for a world governed not by force and fear but by faith and friendship. So far not a selfish act has marked our course either as war makers or as peacemakers. Shall we not see to it that no selfish act shall spoil it as peace keepers? For the honor and safety of America, and for these conscientious reasons only, we entered the war, and for the same reasons we will enter the league of peace. The same conscience which ordered us into the war commands us now to stand by the league.

"Some would have us abandon the Allies and leave it to Europe to keep the peace and help its own weak nations. Such a course is not only impossible, it is unthinkable. If we could not keep out of the war, we can not keep out of the league. Better had we never gone into the war than that we should play the coward now and abandon our friends. The war has taught us that America belongs to the world and must take her share of the world's burdens. As she stood with her allies in war, so she must stand with them in peace.

"The Great War has indeed taught us that war itself is not only a crime, it is an anachronism—a lesson of infinite importance; but after all this is only a negative result—a lesson of what to avoid, not a lesson of what to do. This is the time for constructive action. The old laws and conventions of the political, social, and industrial world are failing. A new world is here—whether we will it or not—a new society is to be organized.

"If our responsibility as makers of peace has been great, our responsibility as its conservers will be even greater. Behold the situation in Europe. Russia is in chaos, Germany is on the edge of it, and Austria has gone to pieces. For the time these vast empires have become, as some one has said, 'mere geographical expressions.' Who can predict the lines of their future development?

"Just two things seem clear. One is that we shall never again have any military autocracies. The kaisers are gone forever, and their empires are broken up. The other thing is that these shattered societies must be organized and brought into the household of nations. Like children, they need direction and help. For this they look chiefly to America and Britain.

"We are at peace with our enemies, yes; but let no one think we are on the eve of millennial harmony. On the contrary, with scores of new questions to settle for 20 or more new States the world is in the most critical condition in a thousand years. It is natural that at this time the governments are confronted by many unreasonable demands, that many ignorant men seek impossible ends by impossible means. It is the inevitable consequence of the war and of what went before the war that the fountains of the deep have been let loose, that eyes have been opened to things never seen before, ears to things never heard before, minds to new dreams, hearts to new hopes; that when the doors of the prison were opened the poor men and women should rush madly forth to abuse their unaccustomed liberties. To heal this situation mere negation and suppression will not suffice. Humanity is hungry for liberty, for democracy in its fullness, for the realization of fraternity in all things. There is one way, and only one way, of mastering the new dangers which in a sense our victory has produced—that way is the league of nations.

"In such a moment as this is it nothing to these partisan objectors to the treaty that they bring back to the councils of the nations the Machiavellian spirit of the old times? On one man's conscience lies the burden of the suffering and slaughter of this war. God grant that on no man's conscience in America may lie the burden of breaking, or even of delaying, this peace, the very thought of which has lifted up the hearts of all mankind and made even these sacrifices seem not in vain. The world stands at the most creative moment of secular history. The armies of the earth have come to the great divide, the watershed of time. Which way shall they march, from the crest into the bright valley of peace or back into the dark chasm of war? The American people will decide. I believe they have decided; and their representatives shall know it and do their will."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement adopted on September 17, 1919, by the Brooklyn League of Nations Committee on the subject of the league of nations.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"STATEMENT ADOPTED SEPTEMBER 17, 1919, BY THE BROOKLYN LEAGUE OF NATIONS COMMITTEE AS TO AMENDMENTS AND RESERVATIONS TO THE COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS PROPOSED BY MAJORITY OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

"The majority report as to the peace treaty of the Committee on Foreign Relations presented to the United States Senate September 10, 1919, concedes that the adoption of the amendments and reservations proposed by the committee would involve a reopening of the peace conference, but nonchalantly explains that the peace conference is still in session, and 'that no great amount of time need be consumed in bringing German representatives to Paris,' and that 'the other nations will take us upon our own terms, for without us their league is a wreck.'

"We view with more concern than the majority of the Senate committee the prospect of recommencing negotiations, with its attendant possibilities of opening up afresh among 33 separate States the innumerable controversies composed by the treaty.

"Some of the proposed amendments as to the league would seem to be impossible of acceptance by the other powers. All of them seem unnecessary.

"The so-called Johnson amendment would give to the United States as many votes in the assembly of the league as has the British Empire. That is, either England, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and India would be reduced to one representative jointly, or the United States would have six representatives. The assembly is practically a forum for discussion. In it all nations, large as well as small, have been given single representation. Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa are actually distinct Commonwealths. India soon may be. No reason appears why these should not have a seperate voice, or why, if they have, America should have six times the representation of any other nation. The suggestion is mere jingoism and twisting of the lion's tail.

"An amendment proposes that the United States shall have no representatives on commissions under the league dealing with questions in which we are not immediately interested. If that principle were carried out throughout, no commissions would be created except of men whose nations were directly interested in the controversy before them, and the entire idea of an impartial tribunal, which is the essence of the league, would be destroyed.

"The first so-called reservation, really an amendment modifying article 1 of the covenant, provides that the United States may after two years' notice withdraw from the league unconditionally and not as article 1 provides, upon fulfillment of its international obligations or obligations under the covenant. It can not but be assumed that the United States will always perform its obligations, and if, as is contended, the league is to determine whether those obligations have been performed, the United States can well afford to take the risk of a decision by such a tribunal. If we may demand this reservation far less responsible nations with equal propriety will demand it, and, in case of controversy, withdraw from the league, leaving obligations unfulfilled.

"The second so-called reservation provides that the United States shall not under article 10 of the covenant undertake to preserve against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing independence of any nation, or in case of threat of war by any member resort under article 16 to boycott or to armed force, and that it shall not under article 22 accept a mandate for any weak nation except with the consent of Congress. The provision is ambiguous. It is not clear whether the United States absolutely declines to protect weak powers by boycott or force, or whether it will thus act, as in the case of a mandate, only on consent of Congress. If the former construction holds, the reservation devitalizes the covenant; if the latter, the amendment is needless. The league under article 10 has, upon danger of aggression, power only to advise what action shall be taken. Under article 16 it has, in case of unjustified war, power only to recommend action. Under article 22 mandates can be conferred only upon those nations which are willing to accept them. Before action can be taken in any case Congress, representing the Nation, must act.

"The third so-called reservation provides that the United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are domestic questions with which the league shall have nothing to do. This is to make the United States the judge in its own case. If every other nation were to demand the same right, and, upon a controversy of any sort arising, could say that it was domestic and that the league had nothing to do with it, the whole scheme of arbitration would be broken down.

"The fourth so-called reservation declares that the United States declines to submit to the league any questions with regard to the Monroe doctrine and that this doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone. Article 21 of the covenant states specifically that the covenant does not affect the Monroe doctrine. That article amply preserves the rights of the United States in that doctrine, and further specification is unnecessary.

"This committee very earnestly protests against the adoption by the United States Senate of the majority report of the Committee on Foreign Relations."

W. C. BULLITT'S ACTIVITIES IN FRANCE AND RUSSIA.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Edwin L. James, a New York Times correspondent, the article being clipped from the New York Times and headed "Saw Lenin's hand in Bullitt's plan." It is in regard to the activities in France and Russia of Mr. Bullitt, who was a witness before the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sept. 23, 1919.]

SAW LENIN'S HAND IN BULLITT'S PLAN—ALLIES SPURNED PROPOSAL THAT THEY SHOULD BESEECH PEACE FROM THE SOVIET—REFUSED TO CONDONE REDS—AUTHORITATIVE OFFICIALS IN PARIS SAY WHOLE TRUTH WAS NOT TOLD TO SENATORS.

(By Edwin L. James.)

"PARIS, September 21.

"William C. Bullitt did not tell the Senate Foreign Relations Committee all of the story about his going to Russia. He told the Senators how bad other people's plans were, but he neglected to tell how bad his plan was.

"Bullitt's plan was nothing more or less than that the Allies should recognize the soviet government and then humbly ask the Bolsheviki to grant an armistice. His plan, of which Lenin more than himself was the author, was so distant from anything that could be of use to the peace conference that it quite naturally found its way into the conference wastebasket.

"The real story of Bullitt and his scheme for settling the Russian problem I have from authoritative sources. It comes from those who know where and how the scheme originated and where and how it died. It comes from those who trusted Bullitt and will not trust him any more.

"Bullitt's testimony before the Senate committee was so illuminating on the method of the peace conference that eager historians must regret certain omissions concerning which even Senator LODGE'S painstaking examination failed, were it not for justice to the peace conference the whole world might be content to wait until his autobiography set forth his pro-Bolshevikist plan. But because they believe that his shrinking nature might prevent him from giving facts those who know believe they should fulfill the duty which their knowledge places upon them. They believe that the Senate should not bask in the sunshine of a few bright spots of Bullitt's expedition, but should have the full sunshine of his case from the time the youthful son of light turned his back on Petrograd and his face toward Paris.

"WANTED ALLIES TO ASK FOR PEACE.

"Inasmuch as Bullitt had already sent ahead by cable the text of the 'agreement' he had reached with Litvinoff and Tchitcherin, the mind of the commission was fairly well made up with regard to its merits before his arrival in Paris. It was felt that it contained certain fundamental points which made it useless as basis for negotiations.

"The chief objection was that, according to the form of the agreement, it was to be offered by the allied and associated powers to the soviet government as a proposal for an armistice. Now, even if the powers would have been induced to accept the idea of concluding an armistice with soviet Russia, it was impossible to accept the idea of proposing such an armistice, particularly in the form in which Lenin demanded it.

"It was Lenin's suggestion that the proposal should emanate from the Allies. His reason for this procedure he explained to Bullitt, who thought it sound and worthy. Lenin said that if the soviet government were to make the proposal it would have to be in a special form suited to the temperament of his Bolsheviki—bombastic language would have to be employed, and the whole document would have to be filled with loud denunciation of the faithlessness of the 'capitalistic classes.' He said that if, on the other hand, the proposal came from the Allies it could be framed merely in strictly legal form, and that his bombast and propaganda need not appear. Bullitt 'fell' for this thin argument and expected the peace conference to do likewise.

"In a great many places in the Bolsheviki-Bullitt document the Allies were to recognize the soviet government as the authorized representative Government of the Russian people. Statesmen in Paris were vigorously opposed to any such language or methods in dealing with the Bolshevikist government, since this involved condonation of the Reds in past performance.

"As Bullitt had suggested by cable and confirmed later by word of mouth that this form of proposal was essential to Lenin and could not be altered, the chances for its success were never worth mentioning. Consequently, when Bullitt reached Paris he found that opinion had rather crystalized against his proposals. He found that he was not welcomed with open arms in recognition of a great achievement. He demanded an interview with President Wilson, but the President refused to see him.

"PREDICTED A GREAT CONVULSION.

"Deprived of the ordinary channels through which he might communicate his views to responsible statesmen, he began to communicate to them indirectly through subordinates. Finally, deprived even of that recourse, he buttonholed unsuspecting individuals and led them to quiet places in the Champs Elysees, where he expounded his admiration of Lenin and his devotion to the doctrine of revolution.

"More discouraged by a certain lack of appreciation, which appeared to Bullitt quite out of harmony with his achievements, he announced that he was going to the Riviera and 'lie in the sand and watch the world go to hell.' All this, he prophesied, would take place in 30 days. Lenin, the honorable gentleman that he was, would wait until April 10, the time limit within which he would permit the Allies to propose an armistice.

"Thereafter, Bullitt confided, Lenin would let loose a Red army over the face of Europe, and two continents, from Omsk to Cape Finisterre, would be crimson with the blood of countless thousands. The tide would strike Vienna in 15 days and Rome in 20. Berlin would go under, while France would still enjoy another month of capitalistic existence, but not more.

"All this Bullitt prophesied and chuckled over.

"'Suppose, Bill,' said an acquaintance to him, 'that when the Red flood comes along you'll be riding the crest with Trotski and his generals?'

"Bullitt suddenly became profound and sober.

"'I would feel honored if they would let me,' he said, 'but I'm not good enough.'

"And so Bullitt went to the Riviera to lie in the sand and Europe withstood the shock.

"COLLECTED CONFIDENTIAL DATA.

"Two weeks later he returned to Paris and devoted himself to three tasks. First, he collected certain confidential documents in order to 'make a case' against the President, as he said. Second, he engaged various persons in confidential conversations and elicited their opinions, and thereupon retired to his office to dictate these statements against the coming of his day. Lastly, he held an evening salon in his room, where he lay in pink silk pajamas and discoursed on the joys of self-denial under communism and the moral obliquity of President Wilson.

"The last hours of his public service were devoted to drafting his letter of resignation. Perhaps it is better to say his letters of resignation, for he submitted various farewell letters to Secretary Lansing, Col. House, Mr. White, Gen. Bliss, and Mr. Crew, secretary of the commission.

"His letter to President Wilson was drafted and redrafted. Taking pride in its literary qualities, he showed it confidentially to many friends, some of whom were responsible for the modification of its language. Finally the document was submitted.

"Then he waited for a reply. None came. He sought an audience. None was granted. Thereupon Bullitt decided that the world was entitled to know his reasons for quitting, and he made his letter public.

"The world knows what capital Germany and her allies made out of it. In the files of the American commission there is a clipping from the Vienna Ostdeutsche Rundschau, which said:

"'The letter of one Bullitt is the most serious moral setback which Wilson has suffered in the course of his political life. By this we do not mean that it will constitute the greatest moral defeat for this hypocrite. On the contrary, we dwell in silent hope and joyous expectation that after this first clear and sharp rebuff others will follow of a more marked and obvious nature, which will teach Wilson that he can not play his rôle of tartufe with impunity.

"'Bullitt and his splendid and courageous letter will live forever in the history of mankind. Doubtless Wilson will also live, but Bullitt will unquestionably be infinitely better judged by the verdict of posterity than Wilson. Bullitt is our man, not Wilson.'

"SAW 'REMEDY' IN REVOLUTION.

"The night before he left Paris and its vales of diplomatic iniquity a dinner was given to Bullitt by some of his devotees. At the close of a lively discussion of international sins, Bullitt was asked for his remedy.

"'There is just one remedy,' he replied, 'and that is world revolution.'

"Bullitt went to England for two months and then home.

"This is written to give a picture of Bullitt as he appeared to American statesmen in Paris in his advocacy of Bolshevism. It is intended to show why his plan met the fate that befell it instead of being written in the compact of nations that were planning for justice and liberty.

"I was walking along the Seine this morning with an experienced diplomat with whom I had been discussing the affair of Bullitt and he had finished telling what he knew of the young man's trip to Russia, the fiasco of his plans, and his subsequent action. Then he added:

"'Here endeth the first lesson, but not the last, for a man who has leagued with Lenin, subscribed to the program of world revolution, given courage to the enemy, and betrayed the confidences of his friends may be safely expected to engage on some other high enterprise.'"

ADDRESS BY SAMUEL J. GRAHAM.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD without reading an address by Mr. Samuel J. Graham on the league of nations. It is not very long.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOME REFLECTIONS ON THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AS RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES.

[By Samuel J. Graham, Assistant Attorney General of the United States.]

FOREWORD.

"These papers were prepared for reading by the general public, and not by the learned or critical. For this reason they were designedly made somewhat free in language and unconventional in expression. My purpose was to possibly aid in arousing interest in and discussion of the proposed league of nations by directing attention to historical facts connected with the development and building of our own Government and league of nations and to point out how largely the human element and material predominate in any governmental structure.

"I have been induced to republish them because of the many requests to do so from persons for whose judgment I have the highest regard. If they shall contribute, even in a small way, to make straight the paths for the President to travel when he returns from the peace conference, I will have accomplished my purpose. I have purposely avoided the advocacy of any particular form of constitution for this league of nations. That, as in the case of our own Constitution, must be the result of common counsel and the wisdom of those who compose the peace conference.

"SAMUEL J. GRAHAM.

A WORKING LEAGUE.

THE UNITED STATES AS A LIVING EXAMPLE OF PEOPLES BROUGHT TOGETHER BY COMMON IDEALS AND COMMON DANGERS.

[By Samuel J. Graham, Assistant Attorney General of the United States.]

"Will you permit me, in connection with the much-discussed league of nations, to call attention briefly to some historical facts which I have not seen alluded to, which paved the way to the league of nations which was formed when the Constitution of the United States was adopted and which indicate that this consummation was finally accomplished through the medium of the preexistent league of friendship between the thirteen Colonies, based upon common wrongs, common ideals of justice and liberty, and common hopes? The thirteen original Colonies were joined in a league of friendship based upon wrongs, ideals, and hopes, and so conducted the Revolutionary War for three years before the adoption of the Articles of Confederation. The United States and the Allies have been in a league of friendship since the United States entered this war, a league of friendship growing out of common wrongs, and, it is to be hoped, common ideals and common hopes. Their armies have been under one common commander; the blood of their soldiers has been poured out in a common stream; their navies have been one; they have pooled their financial, industrial, and economic resources; and, for all the purposes of this war, at least, have been in substance a league of nations without formal covenants, a league based upon common wrongs, ideals, and hopes. Now to the facts to which I wish to call attention:

"The port of Boston was closed by order of the English Government by what is known as the Boston port bill, which closed the port to navigation. There had been also passed by Parliament what is known as the regulation act, by which the charter of the Colony of Massachusetts was annulled without any previous notice and its free government destroyed, and a third act which provided that any magistrate, soldier, or officer in Massachusetts who should be indicted should be tried in Great Britain and not in Massachusetts. Notice of these acts was received in America on the 10th of May, 1774, and on the 12th of the same month committees from several towns of Massachusetts held a convention at Faneuil Hall and adopted a circular letter prepared by Samuel Adams, which was sent to all the other Colonies, reciting these wrongs and asking for sympathy and cooperation.

"It is interesting to note that at this time there were very strong jealousies among the Colonies and among their respective peoples a lamentable lack of knowledge of and acquaintance with one another. The Virginia planter and the Boston merchant, by either intercourse or acquaintance, had apparently little in common and knew little of each other. This can be readily understood when it is remembered that it took 10 days to go from Boston to New York and three weeks to go from Virginia to Massachusetts, a long journey over bad and often dangerous roads. They knew each other only through the medium of report in which the false and true were mixed with local prejudices and limited information. The personal touch was wanting. There were but few newspapers, with limited circulation, and the inventions growing out of the discovery and utilization of steam and electricity were unknown. There were no railroads, no telegraph lines, and racial and religious prejudices ran high. In fact, the people of the respective Colonies generally were badly informed, provincial, and with limited intellectual horizons. Their time and attention were engrossed in trying to earn a living for themselves and their families in a hostile and wild country, in many cases in despite of savages and wild beasts. It is necessary to get this picture of the situation in order to appreciate what happened, how the sympathy growing out of common wrongs, inherited ideals, and hopes of freedom and justice in the hearts and traditions of these people led them, in spite of all these obstacles of jealousies, distance, and unacquaintance, to rally to the call of Massachusetts for sympathy and cooperation. The response to this call was immediate and emphatic. Conventions were called in different Colonies, and almost with one accord and without previous conference they in effect declared that the cause of Massachusetts was their cause and that Boston was suffering for that cause. There was sent at once every kind of food and provision, cattle, wheat, fruit, fish, sugar, rice from South Carolina, all as free gifts to this then distant city, with whose people the senders had but little acquaintance and apparently almost nothing in common.

"Now, what is the psychology of this 'hands across the distance,' this free and spontaneous giving of limited substance to a foreign cause and a distant people. It must be remembered that we are nearer to China to-day than many of these people were to Boston. The answer is what I have indicated in the opening of this communication. These Colonies each had treasured ideals and hopes of liberty and justice, and they had suffered common wrongs and injustices from the mother country. The former impelled cooperation and the latter sympathy against the oppression of one of them. It was a fellow feeling, a friendly sympathy of hearts and minds which then and there laid the foundation for and out of which sprang a league of friendship which, though unconscious, informal, without declared purpose or limited by written covenants, was, nevertheless, the sapling from which grew the oak of that league of friendship, a league of friendship born of common sufferings, ideals, and hopes, which afterwards developed into a league of nations with written covenants under the Constitution of the United States. The inception of it, the birth of it, was this rushing together of the hearts and ideals of the peoples of these Colonies in response to this call from Massachusetts for sympathy and cooperation.

"Advancing a step forward and higher, we see this league of friendship and of nations developing along these same lines until it reaches form and utterance in the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, but as yet without formal covenants. Shortly after this appeal of Massachusetts the Sons of Liberty in New York proposed a continental congress, and the House of Burgesses in Virginia requested Massachusetts to name a time and place for the meeting of such a congress. This was promptly done by Massachusetts and the 2d of September, 1774, called for the meeting of that congress. It met. It was an informal conference without defined powers, composed of a chairman, secretary, and some committees, simply a league of friendship, and yet it undertook and waged a war for freedom and justice for two years before the adoption of the Declaration of Independence and three years before its purposes and powers were defined by the adoption of the Articles of Confederation. During that time it conducted a war, appointed officers, raised and equipped an army, established relations with foreign governments in the name of what it called the 'United Colonies,' and called to the command of its 'Continental Army' George Washington, who was to be the living embodiment of this common cause. He commanded the Continental Armies one year before the Declaration of Independence and about two years before the adoption of the Articles of Confederation. By the adoption of the Articles of Confederation this league of nations, based upon a league of friendship, took form. For the first time the world saw it in definite lines; in fact, it is probable that most of the people of the Colonies saw it themselves for the first time in definite lines.

"Here it may be well to say a word about these Articles of Confederation. While they proved imperfect as an instrument for carrying on government and inadequate for the purpose, the ideals, and the hopes that these people had a heart, as is shown by the disorder which existed under them after the Revolutionary War, and which caused the adoption of the Constitution, it is nevertheless a fact that they served the more important purpose of putting in the shape of formal written covenants the outlines of this league of nations which had developed from this informal league of friendship. In the Articles of Confederation are the following:

"'Article I. The style of this confederation shall be "The United States of America."

"'Article III. The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, etc.

"'Article IV. The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the several States in this Union.

"'Article VI. No State without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled shall send any embassy to or receive any embassy from or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance, or treaty with any King, Prince, or State, etc.

"'No two or more States shall enter into any treaty, confederation, or alliance whatsoever between them without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled.

"'No vessels of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any State except such number only as shall be deemed necessary by the United States in Congress assembled, for the defense of such State or its trade; nor shall any body of forces be kept up by any State in time of peace except such number only as in the judgment of the United States in Congress assembled shall be deemed requisite, etc.

"'No State shall engage in any war without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, unless such State be actually invaded by enemies, etc.'

"As pointed out in the opening of this communication, the United States and the Allies have been in a league of friendship similar to that of the Colonies up to the adoption of the Articles of Confederation, since the United States entered this war, and that league is in existence at this moment. It fought this war to a victorious conclusion, it arranged the terms of the armistice that is in operation at the present time, and it is now proceeding to arrange the terms of a world peace. If it can do these things through an informal league born of war and necessity, common wrongs, common ideals, and hopes, why should it not be continued in formal shape in a league of nations, and why should the great opportunity for so doing which has been brought about by this informal league of friendship be lost and wasted? I have yet to hear any satisfactory answer to these questions. The thing has been done once. Why can not it be done again, particularly under much more favorable conditions of propinquity, intelligence, and intercourse?

"England profited by the lesson of this league of nations under the Constitution of the United States and has formed the British Empire, which is a league of nations, as divergent in race, location, religion, tradition, climatic conditions, and inherited ideals as could possibly be imagined. Under it are the Englishman, the Scotchman, the Irishman, the Canadian, the Australian, the Boer of South Africa, the inhabitants of India, etc., yet see how it has stood the test in this war in the splendid way in which all of these people have rallied to the support of the Empire!

"France to-day, with her colonies, is a league of nations, and under her banners in this war fought 680,000 colonials from China, Siam, Morocco, Algiers, and other parts of Africa.

"These leagues of nations are built up on the principle of equality of economic opportunity, as is the United States of America. Its permanence and safety in each case can only be assured by free navigation upon the seas. Again it is asked, Why can not a league of nations based upon equality of economic opportunity, free navigation upon the seas guaranteed, be made a reality?

"Power and the control of their destinies has come to dwell with the people of the earth. The principle is now recognized that every nation before God is a nation with the right to own itself. The sparks of light from the anvil of human emancipation are filling the world with a glow. The people are beginning to feel that indifference to their rights is an invitation to despotism and destruction. The fetters of kingship, social caste, and the dominance of force have been broken and are in the scrap pile. The world has gotten free and clear of the thought that government was intended for power. It was intended for human comfort and welfare; it was designed for an apartment house and not an arsenal. The enlightenment and spread of intelligence to-day is pouring oil into the lamps of the nations. Conscience and intellect have broken through the lines and are leading to the rising sun."

LEAGUE OF NATIONS TO AVERT INTERNATIONAL ANARCHY.

COLLECTIVE INSTEAD OF INDIVIDUAL NATIONALISM ADVOCATED AS SOLUTION OF POST-WAR PROBLEMS.

[By Samuel J. Graham, Assistant Attorney General of the United States.]

"I wish to direct attention briefly to the international anarchy that rioted through Europe for 50 years prior to this war, and which caused it, and the international anarchy that existed among our thirteen original States during the period intervening between the close of the Revolutionary War and the adoption of the Constitution, and was wiped out by the institution of a league of nations, known as the United States of America.

"By the word 'anarchy' I mean what its derivation from two Greek words, one meaning 'without' and the other 'government,' implies: A state of lawlessness or political disorder; a state of lawless confusion; a condition of society where there is no law or supreme power and the absence of regulating power in any sphere.

"For 50 years or more prior to this war Europe internationally has been in a state of lawlessness and confusion and political disorder. Its nations were each in a way a law unto themselves, or trying to be. Each was controlled in its actions toward the other nations solely by its own purposes and seeming interests. Each pursued a policy of irresponsible individual nationalism, as distinguished from collective nationalism and international concert. There was an absence of supreme directing and restraining control of the purposes and interests of all. There was confusion and disorder as f aras their relations with each other were concerned.

"Many of their leaders and reputed statesmen were anarchists in the sense that they were promoters and creators of international lawlessness and disorder. For instance, Bismarck was an anarchist in that he had no regard for the rights or the lives, and was willing at any time to take the property, of any neighboring people, and deliberately played the part in the three wars which Germany wantonly waged while he was controlling her policies.

"International anarchy and its handmaiden—diplomacy—consort with neither morals nor conscience. It represents the reign of physical force, and is a perpetual struggle for mastery, as is the balance-of-power policy—its twin brother. The power that relies on the sword never shares or limits its authority.

"This international anarchy was the child of the policy of individual nationalism, which controlled the life of Europe before and during the period above mentioned, and the life of the thirteen States, as stated, prior to the adoption of the Constitution. It produced in Europe its logical result, war. It was abandoned in time by our thirteen States and replaced by collective nationalism in the form of a league of nations, which is merely a combination of free peoples, a system by which certain phases of the life in these nations, where their common interests are affected, are controlled by a central authority under given limitations and restraints, upon the principle that what is for the benefit of the whole is good for each part.

"And here it should be remembered that each of these thirteen individual States was, for all practical purposes at the time mentioned, an individual nation controlling its own affairs, and with its own form of government. It was by resorting to this policy of collective nationalism through an unwritten league of friendship, in which they pooled their armies, navies, and resources, that the United States, Japan, and the Allies and other nations fought this war to a successful finish. They had abandoned to a very large extent the previously existing principle of individual nationalism to do it.

"The potent instrument of individual nationalism in this international anarchy in Europe has been a system of international deception, trickery, and haggling termed diplomacy, the practices and accomplishments of which have shown it to be but chicanery dressed in the garb of unbridled officialism and the pomp of power. It has always been a 'back-stair' business, and in the language of the street a game of 'flimflam.' The persons who have practiced it most successfully and true to accepted form have shown themselves, to put it plainly, to have combined either the characteristics of the gunman and the 'green-goods man,' as in the case of Bismarck, or of the 'confidence man' and the 'card sharp,' as in the case of Metternich.

"Diplomacy has acted on the principle of 'do your neighbor or he will do you' and 'every man for himself.' It was parent of the international anarchy which stalked through Europe in bloody boots prior to this war, which has just filled the world with horror and disgust. Its system was stealthy and secretive, even to its own people its acts were not revealed, and too often its ignoble methods and results were attired in some high-sounding phrase or boast to hide its deformity.

"So much in general. Now, to be more particular, I wish to point out how individual nationalism in Europe by creating international anarchy brought on war, and how international anarchy, born of the same policy, among the thirteen original States, which held high carnival in this country during the period from the close of the Revolution to the adoption of the Constitution, was arrested and put out of business and peace established by these States abandoning the policy of individual nationalism and adopting the policy of collective nationalism or international concert, as embodied in the Constitution of the United States, the first great league of free peoples and which established peace for each and all of them.

"The history of Europe for 60 years prior to the late war, and that of the United States for five years prior to the adoption of the Constitution, each present pictures of international anarchy produced by individual nationalism. The events in each case can only be touched upon very briefly in this communication.

"Beginning with the year 1850 and down to August, 1914, when this war began, each State in Europe was operating as an individual nationality, with relations more or less intimate with other individual nationalities. There was no general cooperation among them for the common good. Each was seeking its own interests, preparing for either offensive or defensive war. Each was controlled in its own passions, prejudices, and purposes, and went its own way without any particular regard for the rights of the others, except so far as they affected its own interests favorably. During this period of 64 years eight different wars occurred in Europe, not counting this last war, in one or the other of which, at times in one, at other times in two or three, the following Governments were engaged: Prussia, Austria, Russia, France, Italy, Turkey, Serbia, Roumania, Greece, Bulgaria, Poland, and Denmark.

"This state of international anarchy began with the rape of Denmark by Prussia and Austria, and ended in the lawless invasion and spoliation of Belgium and the horrors and crimes of the war just ended. Most of these were wars of aggression, deliberately planned and criminally carried out. Their known purpose was either commercial brigandage or territorial robbery, worked out without the least regard for the lives, rights, and happiness of the individual human beings, or the nation as a whole, affected.

"In this style Prussia and Austria made war on little Denmark and robbed her of territory; Prussia made war on Austria and robbed her of territory; Prussia made war on France after, through crooked diplomacy, arranging it that no other nation would come to her aid, and robbed her of territory and a big indemnity. And so on through the criminal and disgusting roll of these wars, while anarchy laughed to see the sport.

"The climax of this carnival of blood and crime was reached in this last terrible war, which sucked into its burning vortex most of the nations of the world. Shall the condition and systems which produced these results be permitted to continue? Shall no effort be made to effect a change, though the history and experience in the formation of our Constitution have shown that there is an effective remedy by limiting irresponsible individual nationalism and substituting collective nationalism?

"Even had the world no such tested plan it would be foolish and cowardly not to try to work out one. While this many-headed beast lies wounded and crippled among the corpses of its victims, shall no weapon be used and no effort made to finish it? It is always easier to follow precedent and let the world wag than to think or know history and draw light from its lessons and act upon them. It is safer always to stand by and see murder done by a gunman than to attempt to protect his victim and arrest him.

"Forms of government, whether despotisms, monarchies, or democracies, are, in the last analysis, experiments in human housekeeping. The world is, has been, and always will be in transition and in a flux. Conditions are constantly changing, which necessitates changes in the methods of governmental housekeeping. There is no trick of perpetual motion in government any more than in machinery. What under the conditions of yesterday was impossible becomes not only possible but necessary to-day. There was a time when each man lived in his own house, and stoves for cooking were not known, and modern methods of architecture were not practiced. To-day he lives gregariously in apartment houses.

"At the time when our Constitution was adopted the thirteen States were as remote from and had less communication with each other than the peoples of the world have with each other to-day. So that the government housekeeping that was impossible for the world at that time may be possible to-day and the accepted method in the near future.

"As time goes on each generation has a larger store of clarified experience, material, and improved methods with which to build.

"Had collective nationalism been in existence in Europe in the form of a league of nations, combining the moral, physical, and economic forces of the nations, Denmark would not have been wantonly attacked and ravished, nor would any of these wars probably have occurred. The balance-of-power policy was in full swing during this period, and instead of acting as a preventive of international anarchy it proved to be a breeder of it.

"Now, a word or two as to the second part of my proposition:

"After the conclusion of the Revolutionary War lethargy and lack of interest in the general welfare of the States as a whole developed, and vital ambition and the spirit of cooperation seemed in a measure to have flown. The Government, under the Articles of Confederation, seemed to have lost its purpose and the reason for its existence. Each separate State began to be absorbed entirely with its own small affairs and neglect its duty toward the common interest. The articles themselves were without effective means of effecting their purposes.

"The States began to pass discriminatory tariffs against each other, to issue each its own irredeemable paper money as legal tender for debts. One State refused to surrender criminals to another State because it approved of their criminal acts. The people of Pennsylvania and Connecticut were actually at war, plundering and killing each other in the Wyoming Valley. Shay's rebellion occurred in Massachusetts. Mobs at certain points in Massachusetts broke up the courts. Generally the States almost to their limit indulged in petty hostility toward each other. There was a jealous spirit among them, striving each for its own advantage and watchful of a chance to do injury to some other State.

"Confusion and discord and international anarchy were everywhere present, due to each State having adopted again a policy of individual nationalism, which they had abandoned in their league of friendship for the common interest of all during the Revolutionary War. It is not possible here to picture fully the deplorable conditions of international anarchy among the States which existed at this period. Anyone who has or will study the history of the period will, I am sure, agree with my statement that international anarchy existed in most forbidding and threatening shape. Washington, speaking of this state of international anarchy, said:

"'It is as clear to me as A B C that an extension of Federal power would make us one of the most happy, wealthy, respectable, and powerful nations that ever inhabited the terrestrial globe. Without it we shall soon be everything which is the direct reverse.'

"Jefferson, writing to Madison, said:

"'If it remains much longer in its present state of imbecility, we shall be one of the most contemptible nations on the face of the earth.'

"And Hamilton said:

"'There is scarcely anything that can wound the pride and degrade the character of an independent nation which we do not experience.'

"The result of this deplorable state of anarchy was that Washington with other idealists advocated:

"1. An indissoluble union of all the States under a single Federal Government, with power of enforcing its decrees.

"2. That the people must be willing to sacrifice some of their local interest to the common weal; must disregard their local prejudices and regard one another as common citizens of a common country with identical interests in the truest sense.

"This international anarchy, the common danger and general disorder of the country, finally moved certain leading men in the different States—most of them, including Washington, of that class known as idealists, of whom some of what Bacon calls the "seeming wise" statesmen speak so flippantly—who appreciated the danger of the situation, to actively confer and finally arrange for the different States to send representatives to consider and discuss the situation. These representatives came together in a convention at Philadelphia, known as the Constitutional Convention, and, after much debate, prepared and submitted to the States for adoption the Constitution of the United States.

"This Constitution was finally adopted by the States, though its adoption was not by all of them at once. By its adoption individual nationalism was abandoned and refuge and safety sought and found in the ark of collective nationalism and a league of nations. This was achieved primarily through a revival and reorganization of the old friendship and friendly cooperation based upon common ideals of ordered freedom, which brought these States, when colonies, together to fight the Revolutionary War.

"Under this collective nationalism provided by the Constitution, that friendship between the States has grown and solidified until through more than a century of peace and liberty this league of nations has grown to be the most powerful, the most intelligent, the most human, the most kindly, the most reasonable, and the most united people in the world, while Europe under continued unregulated individual nationalism has fallen prey to anarchy. And the Chief Magistrate of this league has been called and has gone to this European political hospital to attempt to bind up the wounds and restore the mangled and broken remains of its political body, where he has been and is daily being greeted with enthusiasm and kindness almost amounting to affection by the peoples of these nations and their statesmen and rulers, because he is the acknowledged enemy of individual nationalism and the spokesman of a collective nationalism which will prevent a return to the old order and thereby establishing a guaranty of peace.

"It is but to look on one picture of Europe, and then upon the other of the United States, for even a wayfaring man to reach an intelligent conclusion. This league of nations job has been done once successfully, why can it not be done again? The principle has been tried and has worked successfully here; why can it not be applied and made to work successfully elsewhere? The units to be assembled for the structure are the same elemental human traits of friendship, hope, love of peace, and yearning for ordered freedom, which are the fundamentals that when organized will form the framework of a league of nations.

"Instead of holding back and speculating about whether and how this league can be formed we should "go to it" and tackle the job. If Columbus had tried first to fully satisfy himself of the success of his undertaking he would never have made the venture and discovered America. If the delegates from the Colonies which met in Philadelphia before the Revolutionary War had waited to satisfy themselves of the result, or work out the details, they would never have fought and won that war, would never have issued the Declaration of Independence. Nor would those other delegates who met after that war in the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia to consider a remedy for the deplorable conditions of anarchy then existing among the original States ever have constructed the Constitution of the United States.

"Something had to be done, and done at once, and they did it. They backed their knowledge and judgment of the past, as well as the possibilities which inhered in the facts of human nature and the ideals of the people, and went promptly and boldly forward to the accomplishment of the task that proved to be the greatest enterprise of all time. Civilization is born of the experience of men and is perfected by experience, as are all human institutions.

"These framers of our Constitution and first great league of nations had but a flickering light from out the past to guide their efforts. We, however, have for our guidance the great headlight of their example, and the success of their work, our own league of nations. We have only to apply and suitably adjust to the world the human principles which its founders used in building our Constitution. The word constitution comes from two Latin words, con, 'together,' and statuens, 'placing,' meaning 'placing together, setting up, as in a frame or body of essential parts.'

"Let us examine the human principles in the Constitution, quoting its preamble. Read it with care, weighing each word:

"'We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity, do hereby ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States.'"

"With these human principles, supported by the yearnings for peace which come to us on winged voices from the uttermost parts of the earth as an incentive, build your world constitution, your league of nations, as Washington, Franklin, Madison, Hamilton, Sherman, and the other great idealists, enemies of doubt and doers of deeds, built the Constitution of our country.

"What is good for the whole is good for every part, the common good reacts, and each part is benefited by the welfare of the whole. Friendliness and goodness in person or nation are the immediate jewels of their souls. They grow with practice and nourish themselves. A nation without friendliness and goodness is a busy, mischievous, wretched thing, a thing for treason and spoils, and is already diseased and doomed.

"There was never a change for the better in human affairs and government that good and wise men were not found to oppose it, and to prophesy disasters which never happened, for time is humorously reckless of the reputations of prophets. It is our limited vision and uncertain thoughts, controlled too often by words, that people our mental darkness with hobgoblins and specters.

"The real government will not be permanent unless it rests upon ideals. The world must not compromise with this situation. Some one has said that compromise is 'a good umbrella but a poor roof.' It is a temporary expedient and almost sure to be unwise statesmanship. Government becomes more nearly perfect as it approaches Christianity.

"In conclusion let me quote from Lincoln, who once said, with his uncommon sanity: 'I haven't much opinion of a man who isn't wiser to-day than he was yesterday.'"

SOCIETY OF NATIONS.

[Address delivered by Samuel J. Graham, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, before the annual banquet of the Democratic Editorial Association of the State of Indiana, at Indianapolis, on February 6, 1919.]

"Man is the biggest, most certain, and all-embracing thing in the world. All history, whether of religion, literature, economics, or government, is but the story of man's effort to make a living. All society, all government, all the ramifications of life in the world, are but systems or methods devised by man to promote his efforts to make a living. The human element is life itself, and all of life. As man becomes more civilized, he becomes more friendly, more moral, less selfish, and with more of that in him to which you appeal to lead a forlorn hope. By far the greater part of government is humanity. The Declaration of Independence mentions as the essential rights of man the human things for which government was instituted, the guaranty of 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.' Therefore, in constructing government, you must bear in mind this vital and significant element of humanity involved. It is upon this weighty human element that all wise and permanent government must rest. Man is by nature a social animal, and as he associates with his fellows and comes more frequently and regularly in contact with them this sociability is increased, as is his morality, which springs from a regard and respect for the rights of others. This spirit of association, what is termed the 'get together' spirit, which runs through all human life and is so marked a characteristic of our life to-day, is the most powerful element in man's life in the world and the great ligament that binds him to his fellows, the electric current which flashes from mind to mind. As methods and means of intercourse, acquaintance with and knowledge of each other, increase, this spirit of association, with the spread of intelligence—through the telephone, the telegraph, steam, electricity, the radio, the airship, the newspaper, the rapid communication throughout the world of events—has vastly increased, and daily increasing, and will continue to increase. How it has increased since the day of our revolutionary fathers will be appreciated when it is remembered that it took 10 days to go from New York to Boston and three weeks to go from Virginia to Massachusetts. The nations of the world know more of each other and are closer together to-day, are better informed of the history of and the events in their respective countries, than ever before. Through the medium of the press they confer with each other daily. For this reason it has become easier to bring them together in an association where such an association promises a common benefit and affects the interests of all.

"The success of government depends upon its people being free and contented, and this they can not be while the possibility of destruction and slavery through war exists. The people of all the world know this fact to-day, and appreciate it, and are demanding that there be an end put to war.

"While lessons are, and in a measure must be, drawn from the past, they should be read in the light of present events. It is true that civilization is born of the experience of man and is perfected by experience, as are all our human institutions and governments, and as time goes on each generation has a larger store of clarified experience, material, and improved methods with which to build its social structure and its government, but it must be remembered that all forms of government, whether despotisms, monarchies, or democracies, are, in the last analysis, but experiments in human housekeeping, a part of man's efforts to make a living. The world is, has been, and always will be in transition and in a flux. Conditions are constantly changing, which necessitates changes in methods of governmental housekeeping. There is no trick of perpetual motion in government any more than in machinery. What under conditions of yesterday was impossible becomes not only possible but necessary to-day. There was a time when each man lived in his own house, and stoves for cooking were not known, and modern methods of architecture were not practiced. To-day he lives gregariously in apartment houses. What was impossible in government a hundred years ago is entirely possible to-day, because of the easy and rapid spread of this spirit of association of which I have spoken and increased facilities for carrying it out.

"At the foundation of society and government are certain human traits, chief among which are friendliness, goodness, love of peace, and a desire for ordered freedom, a recognition of the principle that what is good for all is good for each part and that the common good reacts upon each part. Real government can not be permanent unless it rests upon these elements and upon ideals. In other words, government becomes more nearly perfect as it approaches Christianity. These human traits are the materials from which must be constructed a league of nations or a society of nations, as you may choose to designate it. In this country we are living to-day, and have lived for more than a century, under a society of nations, the United States of America. The society of nations plan is not new. It is an old and familiar story to us of the United States and to most of the world. The convention at Philadelphia which formed our Constitution constructed the first great society of nations, and it constructed it out of the human traits, characteristics, and aspirations that I have mentioned. Observe the human things, the traits and ideals, that are embodied in the preamble of our Constitution. Listen with care while I read it:

"'We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity, do hereby ordain and establish the Constitution of the United States.'

"It is interesting to study the growth of this first great society of nations, the United States of America. This occasion does not permit me to go into detail, but a few facts will serve to present an outline of the picture of its formation.

"After the 'Boston Tea Party,' the English Parliament closed the port of Boston, revoked the charter of Massachusetts, and did other acts tending to oppress her and her people. As soon as notice of these acts reached Massachusetts, a meeting was held in Fanuell Hall, at which a resolution was presented, prepared by Samuel Adams, calling upon the other Colonies for sympathy and support. At this time these Colonies knew relatively very little about each other, and their people had very little acquaintance with each other. As I have stated, it took 10 days to go from New York to Boston. There were no steamboats, no telegraphs, no telephones, and only a few small newspapers with limited local circulation, with indifferent mail facilities. Local prejudices, religious and otherwise, ran high. There was the Puritan in Massachusetts, the Churchman in Virginia, the Catholic in Maryland, and the Quaker in Pennsylvania. On the surface they had but little interest in common, but the response to this call of Massachusetts was prompt and emphatic. In substance they said that the cause of Massachusetts was their cause. They said to her, in effect, 'Name a time and place where we can get together to talk this over and see what can be done.' Massachusetts named Philadelphia and the 2d day of May, 1774. The representatives from the different Colonies met there, and a few days later they formed an organization with the usual officers and some committees. It was merely a 'get together' meeting to discuss the situation, but note what happened. Without more ado, without defined powers or authority, this 'get together' meeting proceeded to wage a war, to raise an army and a navy, and appoint a commander in chief, George Washington, who afterwards became the living embodiment of the cause. And they waged this war for two years before the Declaration of Independence was adopted and published, three years before the Articles of Confederation were promulgated, and about seven years before they were finally adopted by all of the States. Here was this spirit of association in operation. Upon what framework and organization did it rest? It was based upon a league of friendship growing out of the common ideals and hopes of liberty and ordered freedom and innate friendliness of the people of these Colonies and a desire for the common welfare. In an undeveloped state it embraced the same human principles and aspirations mentioned in the preamble to the Constitution, and it is interesting to note that in the Articles of Confederation the third article using this language:

"'The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other, etc.'

"This league of friendship first showed its outline and assumed form in these Articles of Confederation. And while in the confusion and lethargy and general business distress that followed the close of the Revolutionary War there was a falling away from this league of friendship on account of the article not being effective to carry out its purposes, it was revived by Washington, Madison, Hamilton, and Franklin, and those other great idealists and lovers of mankind and humanity, and carried forward to the convention at Philadelphia, known as the Constitutional Convention, which resulted in the adoption of the Constitution of the United States and the forming of the first great society of nations. It must be remembered here that each of these thirteen original States was at that time an independent nation with its own government. Under the protection of this society of nations we have lived for more than 100 years until we have become the most powerful, the most kindly, the wealthiest, the most intelligent, the most humane and united nation in the world, and to-day the Chief Magistrate of this society, the product of its civilization, the greatest man in the world, is sitting at the council table of the nations in an effort to carry forward in some workable form this principle and spirit of association of nations which we in this country have found so beneficent in our society of nations and establish it for the whole world and each nation, great and small, that man wherever he lives may rest under his own vine and fig tree with none to molest or make him afraid.

"Moving forward to the present day, a few words as to the present situation in the world. The United States entered this war in association with the Allies, Japan, Brazil, and its other cobelligerents. What happened? They united their armies under a common commander, they united their navies, they pooled their resources, they pooled their finances, and more important still they pooled their pledges and their purposes. Under this association they fought this war to a conclusion, they dictated the terms of the armistice, and they are now sitting down to write a treaty of peace. There were no written covenants or agreements. This joint action was founded upon an informal, unwritten league of friendship, just such as I have pointed out existing among our revolutionary fathers during the Revolutionary War—a league of friendship based upon common purposes, common ideals, common aspirations for justice and human freedom and peace. This league of friendship, while unwritten, is none the less in honor binding upon us and the other parties to it. It is not now a question of whether we will enter a society of nations; we are in one now and we can not retire from it with honor and without discredit. A verbal contract at law is none the less enforceable because it is not written, if the facts are admitted. No joint action was ever undertaken among men, whether for business, social matters, or government, that did not create joint obligations which afterwards had to be worked out in common, entailing responsibilities and duties upon each member.

"If our revolutionary fathers could carry forward a league of friendship to a successful society of nations, why can not this league of friendship existing between these nations of to-day be carried forward in the same way? As I have stated, what is impossible at one time is possible at another. The rapid spread of intelligence, quick communication, and knowledge of each other by the people of the world make it possible to-day when it would not have been possible a century ago. You have but to take the same human elements, traits, and characteristics and use them in erecting your structure. England, profiting by the lesson of the Revolutionary War and our example, has to-day in the British Empire a society of nations. In this society is living to-day the Englishman, the Scotchman, the Irishman, the New Zealander, the Boer, the Australian, the inhabitants of India and of her many possessions, peoples of all climates, languages, religions, traditions, colors of skin. Note how magnificently they rallied to her support in the war.

"France to-day, in another form, not as highly developed, is a society of nations. She had 680,000 colonials fighting for her on the western front, from China, Siam, Morocco, Algiers, and her other colonies. This society of nations plan has been tried and worked in one form and another by the three most powerful nations of the world to-day in their governments. Why can't it be worked out for the world under such favorable conditions as exist to-day?

"There was never a change for the better in human affairs and government that good and wise men were not found to oppose it and to prophesy disasters which never happened, for events are humorously reckless of the reputation of prophets. It is our limited vision and uncertain thoughts, controlled too often by words, that people our mental darkness with hobgoblins and specters.

"Instead of holding back and speculating about whether and how this society should be formed, we should go forward as Columbus did when he made the venture and discovered America, as the delegates from the Colonies went forward and fought the Revolutionary War, without waiting to satisfy themselves as to what the results would be. Had they waited they would never have done it and would never have issued the Declaration of Independence, nor would the delegates who met in the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia ever have constructed the Constitution of the United States. The thing has been done once in this country; it has been done under the British Empire; why can't it be done for the world? We have only to back our knowledge and judgment of the facts of the past and of the possibilities that inhere in human nature and ideals of the people of the world and their longing for peace, and go promptly and boldly forward to the accomplishment of this great enterprise.

"Cæsar said of one of his lieutenants, who had worked out a critical situation: 'He took counsel of his valor.' Let us take counsel of our knowledge, judgment, and experience of the past, possibilities of the present, hopes of the future, as well as our valor, and go forth among our fellow citizens to tell them that this thing has been done, can be done, and ought to be done, to prepare them for the return of their Chief Magistrate, that they may be in mind to say as patriots and lovers of humanity to their leader: 'Well done, good and faithful servant, you shall be upheld and supported, you shall enter into our heart of hearts, for inasmuch as you have done it unto the least of these you have done it unto us.'"

INTERNATIONAL TELEGRAPHIC CONFERENCE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of a message from the President of the United States in regard to an international telegraphic conference, which at this time is a matter which, I think, should be disposed of at once. I see by the note on the message that it was received on the 10th of September. I never heard of it until this moment, when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] called my attention to it, for the reason that it has never come to the committee. I do not know who is responsible for the failure, but I should like to call attention to the matter on that account.

POSTMASTER GENERAL AND CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Concurrent and other resolutions are in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if there are any concurrent or other resolutions I have no desire to interfere with their presentation, but if there are none I wish the Chair would lay before the Senate Senate resolution 186, which went over on a previous day under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution referred to by the Senator from Nebraska, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 186), as follows:

Whereas it is currently reported in the public press that the Postmaster General has been actively engaged in interfering with the work of the Civil Service Commission in relation to the examination and certification by said commission of eligibles from which postmasters are to be selected, and is attempting to control said examinations and certifications with a view of securing partisan political appointments to such places; and

Whereas it is also reported that in carrying out such plan the President has demanded the resignation of certain members of the Civil Service Commission; and

Whereas one of said commissioners, in resigning his place, has issued a public statement in which the foregoing facts are in substance charged: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate such charges and reports, and report to the Senate, first, whether the Postmaster General has used the power of his office to control the action of the Civil Service Commission in such examinations and certifications; and, second, if the committee finds that the Postmaster General is guilty of such charges, then was such action on the part of the Postmaster General taken with the consent and the knowledge of the President of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think it was generally commented on by the newspapers and magazines of the United States that the attempted interference on the part of the Postmaster General with the work of the Civil Service Commission was instrumental in bringing about the demand for the resignation, or the removal in effect, of at least two members of the Civil Service Commission. In the New York Times of September 7 is printed an account of this matter very similar to accounts that were printed generally in the newspapers of the country; and I wish to read a portion of the comments by the newspaper and also a statement made by Mr. Galloway. The article is headed:

GALLOWAY RESIGNS; BLAMES BURLESON—WAS OUSTED FOR REFUSING TO HELP DEBAUCH CIVIL SERVICE, COMMISSIONER DECLARES—WILSON'S MOVE A SURPRISE—MAY PAVE WAY FOR DEPARTMENT INVESTIGATION—PRESIDENT RESTRAINS POSTAL HEAD.

WASHINGTON, September 6.

Postmaster General Burleson evidently has won another victory and survived another attack. This afternoon it was announced that Charles M. Galloway, of South Carolina, a Democratic member of the Civil Service Commission, had handed in his resignation and the President had accepted it.

For months there has been constant friction between Mr. Burleson and Mr. Galloway, due to what the civil service commissioner has said in private were the autocratic methods of the Postmaster General and his attempts to make the civil service alter its rulings to suit the political ends of the Cabinet officer. In a statement this afternoon Mr. Galloway said his resignation had been "forced," and it is understood that President Wilson lately communicated with him, giving him virtually an ultimatum.

This ultimatum must have come as a surprise, for after the President last winter asked for the resignation of Mr. Galloway and Hermon W. Craven, a Republican member of the commission, Mr. Galloway tendered his resignation but it was not accepted. Apparently all was serene so far as the Democratic member of the commission was concerned. It is said that he received assurances that his best course would be to remain in office until the President's return from France this summer.

However, the issue between Mr. Burleson and Mr. Galloway has been growing more strained weekly. Political prophets here said there was no question but one or the other would have to be beheaded. As it turns out, the President appears to have stood by the much-criticized Mr. Burleson and ousted Mr. Galloway, his appointee of 1913.

The statement which Mr. Galloway made this afternoon follows——

Then, Mr. President, is printed the statement issued by Mr. Galloway, which I will now read. Mr. Galloway in this statement says:

My resignation was forced because I would not cooperate with Postmaster General Burleson in debauching the civil service and making a sham of the merit system. Hermon W. Craven, the Republican member, and I, a Democrat, were ousted from the commission because we were not willing that the commission should be a mere adjunct of the Post Office Department and subservient to it, especially with reference to examinations for presidential postmaster under the Executive order of March 31, 1917.

A very recent example of Mr. Burleson's conduct is furnished by his proposed amendment to this order, which now awaits the signature of the President. The existing order provides that the eligible candidate with the highest standing shall be nominated. A large number of nominations have been held up, many of them for a long time, evidently in anticipation of this amendment, which will enable Mr. Burleson, in many cases, to deprive those standing highest in these examinations of the nominations to which they already are entitled. Among the post offices affected by the amendment are those in Boston, Mass., and Newark, N. J.

Furthermore, a short time ago the commission unanimously recommended that the President appoint as chief examiner an employee of the commission who is better qualified for this position than any other person of whom the commission has knowledge; but the Postmaster General desires that the position be filled by another person of his own selection.

That is the end of Mr. Galloway's statement. I will not read all the comment of the paper, but I want to read some excerpts from it.

Farther on, in commenting upon this statement of Mr. Galloway, this article states:

It is understood that the amendment suggested by Mr. Burleson, and to which Mr. Galloway alludes in his statement, would allow the Postmaster General to retain in post offices the second in command, despite the fact that some outside applicant might have won the post with the highest rating. Critics of Mr. Burleson say this would give him unlimited power to build up and repair his political machine. The chief criticism of the Postmaster General by those who have taken the side of the civil service is that he has exercised favoritism and discrimination in appointments and has held up other appointments.

I think, Mr. President, I had better read the order of the President to which reference is made, as I shall have occasion to refer to it later on.

The order of the President of the United States, putting the appointment of these first, second, and third class postmasters practically under civil service, reads as follows:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

APPOINTMENT OF FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD CLASS POSTMASTERS.

The President, on March 31, 1917, issued the following order:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Hereafter when a vacancy occurs in the position of postmaster of any office of the first, second, or third class as the result of death, resignation, removal, or, on the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster General, approved by the Postmaster General, to the effect that the efficiency or needs of the service requires that a change shall be made, the Postmaster General shall certify the fact to the Civil Service Commission, which shall forthwith hold an open competitive examination to test the fitness of applicants to fill such vacancy, and when such examination has been held and the papers in connection therewith have been rated, the same commission shall certify the result thereof to the Postmaster General, who shall submit to the President the name of the highest qualified eligible for appointment to fill such vacancy, unless it is established that the character or residence of such applicant disqualifies him for appointment. No person who has passed his sixty-fifth birthday shall be given the examination herein provided for.

Mr. President, I was delighted when the President of the United States issued this order. I think it was a good step in the right direction. I believe all those who have given careful study to the selection and the appointment of postmasters were glad when the President took this step. The fourth-class postmasters had been put fully under civil-service regulations, but on account of a constitutional provision in regard to the appointment of the presidential postmasters it was impossible fully to put all of the postmasters under the civil-service regulations. The President in this order came as near to it as I think it is possible to go. I believe he is entitled to credit, and I want to give him credit for taking this much-desired step in taking postmasters of the first, second, and third classes out of the political scrap heap, where appointments often had been made merely for the purpose of paying for political activities, and not upon the ground of the fitness of the applicant for the position.

This order was given great circulation. Of course the President was under no legal obligation to issue this order. He had a right to proceed as has been done before, under the old method of having the appointment made as a reward for political activity. Having taken this step, however, and issued this order, it was, of course, incumbent upon him and those under him to see that the order was carried out in good faith. My judgment is that the order has not been carried out in good faith, and I think an investigation will disclose in substance the truth of the charges made by Mr. Galloway.

The people of the country were given to understand that the post offices had been taken out of politics, and yet the activities of the Post Office Department were such as to keep them in politics as much as possible, without permitting the country to know what the real facts were. I believe that an investigation under the resolution I have introduced will disclose the fact that a large number of eligibles for postmaster, running into the hundreds and I am not sure but into the thousands, have been selected by the Civil Service Commission in accordance with this Executive order of the President, and that they have been held up a long period of time; that the Postmaster General has resorted to all kinds of schemes to circumvent the action of the Civil Service Commission whenever the eligible certified by the Civil Service Commission did not suit, in politics or otherwise, the idea of the Postmaster General.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, is it not true that they did not go altogether on the result of the examination, but sent out special investigators, and they came back and reported?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I thank the Senator for that suggestion.

I want to call attention now to one or two sentences in the order. This order, you will observe, instructs the First Assistant Postmaster General to certify to the President the person who has passed the best examination held by the Civil Service Commission. It says:

> And when such examination has been held and the papers in connection therewith have been rated, the same commission shall certify the result thereof to the Postmaster General, who shall submit to the President the name of the highest qualified eligible for appointment to fill such vacancy, unless—

Now, here is the exception:

> Unless it is established that the character or residence of such applicant disqualifies him for appointment.

It seems to me that a fair interpretation of the order would limit the Postmaster General, when he came to make his certification to the President, to that exception named in the order itself, and that he should certify the highest eligible to the President "unless it is established that the character or residence of such applicant disqualifies him for appointment."

I think an investigation will show that it was a common custom for the Postmaster General, when the name was certified, if the man certified was not satisfactory to the Postmaster General and his advisers politically, to send out his inspectors to make an investigation with a view of disqualifying the man, and not with a view of making a fair and honest investigation.

I am going to give to the Senate some instances that I think absolutely demonstrate that, as far as it is possible to demonstrate it with the facilities that I have to get the facts.

An investigation will disclose that in carrying out this plan the Postmaster General has done some things that seem to me to be sufficient grounds for impeachment. I know, Mr. President, that my facilities for getting the information are necessarily limited, and it may be that a complete investigation would explain away a good many things that can not be explained away with the facilities for investigating that I have at my command or that any other Senator has. It will require a committee with power to get the evidence and swear the witnesses in order in a great many instances to get it all.

I understand that in one case the Civil Service Commission, performing what I believe to be its sworn duty under the law, made an investigation where a charge was made of political activity on the part of one of the employees of the Post Office Department. The charge was made that he had violated the law. I do not believe it will be necessary for me to cite the statute to the Senate, but in the civil-service act there are certain political activities on the part of governmental officials that are made criminal, and out in California, I believe it was, where such a charge was made against one of the employees of the Post Office Department for trying to get political contributions from employees of the Government, the Civil Service Commission made an investigation, became convinced that the charge was true, and the official against whom the charge was made was arrested and indicted by a grand jury, and, I understand, on trial plead guilty and paid a fine; so that he stands convicted of the crime in court.

The Civil Service Commission thought that was sufficient reason for the removal by the Postmaster General of any employee in his department so found guilty. Notwithstanding the fact that they called the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact and asked for the removal from office of this man, he was not removed; he is still in the service, and I believe that the evidence will disclose that the Postmaster General has promoted him.

That is not all, Mr. President. The evidence will disclose, upon a fair investigation, in my judgment, that in that particular case the Postmaster General not only refused to remove the man who was guilty of the violation of the law, but that he asked the Civil Service Commission to remove the man who had made the investigation and brought out the evidence which secured the conviction.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, my attention was temporarily diverted, and I would like to know to what case the Senator referred. Was it the case of Mr. Greenup, at Bremerton, Wash.?

Mr. NORRIS. I could not say. I did have the name in looking it up, but I have either misplaced it or it has been lost.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not know but that the Senator had mentioned the name. That was the reason why I asked.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not mention the name. If I had it here, I would not object at all to giving it, because, of course, it would be proper for that to be brought out if the resolution is passed and the investigation takes place. I will refer to it later on, probably, when I read a citation or two from the decisions of the Supreme Court on the question of impeachment.

In my judgment that is a serious proposition. In my judgment, the Postmaster General had but one duty to perform under this order, and that was to carry it out in good faith, and if he did not so carry it out, if he resorted to various methods in secret to circumvent it while the public was given to understand that it was being carried out, he ought at least to be removed. Men in office have been impeached for offenses not as great as the one to which I have just called attention. He not only kept the culprit in office, and promoted him, but asked that the man who was instrumental in disclosing the truth, and bringing the evidence that brought about the conviction, should himself be removed from office.

The evidence will disclose that in various other ways the Postmaster General has tried to interfere with the work of the commission. I have no doubt that what it will disclose is that in an examination in the State of Texas the Postmaster General had a relative who applied to the Civil Service Commission, and who took the examination, and that before the papers were rated, after the examination, however, had taken place, and while the papers were either being sent to or were then in the hands of the Civil Service Commission for examination and rating, the private secretary of the Postmaster General himself called upon one of the Civil Service Commissioners, stating that the Postmaster General's relative, giving her name, had been one of the applicants, and he was exceedingly anxious that in her case the commission should see that this particular applicant was rated so that she might be appointed to the position of postmistress.

You will note that in the statement of Mr. Galloway, which I have read, he made reference to the appointment of a chief examiner. There is a vacancy now in the office of Chief Examiner of the Civil Service Commission. The man who for a great many years held that position has been appointed a member of the Civil Service Commission; I think it was a very good appointment. Certainly, his experience and work for a good many years qualify him to make an excellent commissioner. I have no doubt the evidence will disclose that the Postmaster General is trying now to control that appointment, with a view of getting a man as chief examiner who will see that more Democrats are made eligible in these examinations; and the evidence will disclose that that is one of the things he is trying to bring about now.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that was the purpose of the Postmaster General, how does the Senator from Nebraska account for the charge made by Mr. Galloway, a Democratic member of the commission, that it was through the Postmaster General's influence that he was discharged? In other words, before he was discharged the commission was composed of Mr. Morrison, a Democrat; Mr. Galloway, a Democrat from South Carolina; and Mr. Wales, a Republican from Vermont. If the motive of the Postmaster General was political, to get Democrats appointed to office, why did he bring about the resignation of a Democratic member and leave the commission composed of one Democrat and one Republican? How does the Senator explain that?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will be very glad to answer the question of the Senator from Tennessee, and I thank him for propounding it.

There are Democrats and Democrats, as well as Republicans and Republicans. There are Democrats who believe in the enforcement of the law, and who are fair, who believe that the civil-service law ought to be carried out in good faith, notwithstanding that the question of the Senator from Tennessee might imply that there are no such Democrats. I think there are, and Mr. Galloway apparently is one of them. He insisted that the spirit as well as the letter of the civil-service law should be carried out. Democrat though he was, he said and has said by his official acts and his conduct in office that it was his sworn duty as a member of the Civil Service Commission to see that the civil-service law was carried out in good faith, which means that there should be no discrimination as between Democrats and Republicans, that everybody should be put upon the same basis, and that political affiliations will "cut no ice" in a civil-service examination.

It was because he was that kind of a Democrat that he did not suit Mr. Burleson, and that is the sum, in my judgment, of his sinning; that is the reason he is a private citizen to-day, instead of drawing a salary from the Federal Treasury.

I was about to start on a statement as to the chief examiner. First, let me say that the chief examiner must be appointed by the President, notwithstanding he works under the Civil Service Commission. Congress, when it enacted the law providing for the Civil Service Commission, undoubtedly wanted to free the chief examiner as much as possible from partisan political influence, and hence it provided in the law that the chief examiner should be selected by the Civil Service Commission. The part of section 3 of the civil-service act which bears upon this particular point reads as follows:

That said commission is authorized to employ a chief examiner, a part of whose duty it shall be, under its direction, to act with the examining boards, so far as practicable, whether at Washington or elsewhere, and to secure accuracy, uniformity, and justice in all their procedings, which shall be at all times open to him. The chief examiner shall be entitled to receive a salary at the rate of $3,000 a year, and he shall be paid his necessary traveling expenses incurred in the discharge of his duty.

That is all the section says about the chief examiner. It will be observed that Congress wanted to remove the chief examiner entirely from any partisan political influence, and hence provided in the law that he should be employed—mark the word "employed"—by the Civil Service Commission.

Attorney General Garland, who was Attorney General under Mr. Cleveland, rendered an opnion on that point on the 26th day of May, 1886. This law had been in force then a little more than three years. The syllabus of that opinion reads as follows:

The office of chief examiner in the Civil Service Commission, created by the act of January 16, 1883, chapter 27, is to be filled by appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I have read that opinion. He bases the conclusion upon paragraph 2 of section 2 of Article II of the Constitution of the United States, which I will read. Reading from the Constitution:

He—

Referring to the President of the United States—shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law: but Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

Attorney General Garland reaches the conclusion that the chief examiner of the Civil Service Commission is an officer of the United States, and that since his appointment has not been provided for by law to be made by the courts or the heads of departments, and since this commission is not a department, it must follow under the Constitution of the United States that he must be appointed by the President.

I have no desire, of course, to set up my opinion against that of Attorney General Garland. However, I wish to say, in passing, that I do not agree with the reasoning of the Attorney General here. I have read the citations that he has given in his opinion and I do not think they bear it out. He says, after quoting the Constitution, in his opinion:

The examiner is certainly under this act an officer as distinguished from a mere clerk or employee. His station embraces the idea of tenure, duration, emolument, duties, and then becomes an office.

I do not believe it embraces all those elements, and he is certainly not by the act called an officer of the United States. The Attorney General says he is not a mere employee and yet the act itself uses the word "employ" rather than "appoint" or "select," and says the Civil Service Commission may employ a chief examiner. There is not any tenure. The Civil Service Commission, if full force had been given to that act, would have been able to employ a man to-day and remove him to-morrow. He had no permanency whatever. He was, in my judgment, an employee of the Civil Service Commission. But, of course, that is settled, no matter what I may think about it, by the Attorney General.

So far as I know the courts have never passed on it, but my understanding is that from the days of Attorney General Garland down to now the opinion has stood unquestioned, and the President has always appointed the chief examiner of the Civil Service Commission. As far as I know, without exception, the Presidents, both Democratic and Republican, have always asked the Civil Service Commission for a recommendation, and have appointed the man as chief examiner—I think without exception; I may be mistaken; I have not looked it up—whom the civil service recommended, thus, in effect, giving the Civil Service Commission the right to name this man, just as though the Attorney General had not held that that part of the statute was unconstitutional. That is as it should be. We are all interested in seeing the civil service kept out of politics. No matter how bitterly we may disagree among ourselves on partisan lines, I think we are all agreed that the usefulness of the civil service depends upon keeping it out of partisan politics. One of the things upon which it depends, and without which it can not accomplish the end which it is intended to perform and without which it will be an absolute failure, is that it must be free from partisan politics. That is the reason why, believing that the Postmaster General has been trying to make it simply a political tool to carry out his plans and his schemes and build up a political machine, I have introduced the resolution.

The Civil Service Commission, in accordance with the custom always in vogue heretofore, have recommended a chief examiner to the President for appointment. That recommendation, made some time ago, is still in the hands of the President and upon it he has not acted.

An investigation will disclose that the Postmaster General has a candidate for this place and that he has a man whom he is urging to be appointed. As far as I know, no one knows the politics of the man whom the Civil Service Commission has appointed. He has been for 10 years or more one of the examiners in the Civil Service Commission, working under the chief examiner, working under one of the commissioners who formerly was chief examiner. It would seem that if we want to carry out the theory, the intent that is shown in the law that the Civil Service Commission should be kept out of partisan politics, the commission's recommendation for chief examiner should be followed. It would seem that the Postmaster General is out of place when he is trying to come in and control the appointment of the chief examiner for the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The chief examiner during the last four years has been Mr. Wales?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. He is a very splendid man?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. He was a Vermont Republican and grew up in that party, and he was the examiner. He has been promoted now to the place of commissioner.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I said that in substance awhile ago, although I did not use his name. Mr. Wales was chief examiner for a great many years. Nobody knew what Mr. Wales's politics were until the President appointed him commissioner, when it was his duty to appoint a Republican to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Craven, the Republican member.

I did not read it, but the law provides that the commission shall be divided and that all three commissioners shall not belong to one political party. It has been the invariable custom, when there is a Democratic President, that he appoints two Democrats and one Republican, and when there is a Republican President, he appoints two Republicans and one Democrat. I am not arguing that proposition. If I had my way about it I would not have any such limitations in the law. I do not care whether they are all Democrats or all Republicans if they do their duty, as I believe this Democratic Commissioner Galloway was doing his duty. They should have no politics in their official business and should keep entirely out of it.

As I said, I do not believe there was a man connected with the commission or anybody else who knew what Mr. Wales's politics were. He had been there, I think, for 10 years as chief examiner. That is another reason why the recommendation of Mr. Wales on that point ought to be followed by the President. He knows; he has worked for 10 years with the man whom the commission is now recommending. I do not think they know what may be his politics.

I think the evidence will disclose that Mr. Burleson has said that they wanted a Democrat as chief examiner in order that they might get more Democratic eligibles to be appointed postmasters where the Civil Service Commission held examinations over the country.

Mr. President, I wish to read a citation that the Attorney General gives. I want to read it in connection with what I have heretofore said about the Postmaster General's activity in this matter, about his shielding the man who pleaded guilty to a crime, keeping him in office, and asking the commission to remove the man who brought out the evidence upon which the man was convicted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state what case that was?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the case about which the Senator asked me awhile ago. I could not give him the name then.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not remember whether it was the Washington State case or the Buffalo case or what case it was?

Mr. NORRIS. No. Let me read from what Mr. Madison, one of the framers of the Constitution, one of the forefathers, said when he was speaking of the appointing power that was given to the President and the Assembly. I will say the Supreme Court reached the conclusion that where the law provided for the appointment of an official and made no provision about his removal, it followed that the appointing power had the removal power. Mr. Madison observed:

> The danger then consists merely in this, that the President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it.

And that would be true of the chief examiner or a member of the Civil Service Commission. Although the law specifically gives the President the right to remove a civil-service commissioner, the statute, as I read it, did not even give him the power to appoint the chief examiner. That came about by a construction of the law by the Attorney General:

> What will be the motive which the President can feel for such abuse of his power and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by the House for such an act of maladministration, for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust.

If Mr. Madison thought that such a case would be a sufficient ground of impeachment, what would he have said if it had been disclosed to him that the officer was keeping in office a man who had been convicted of a crime and demanding the removal from office of the man who furnished the evidence upon which he was found guilty?

The Supreme Court indorsed that language of Madison. They say:

> No intimation is given of the power to remove at pleasure. In contrast with this narrow prerogative, this distinguished judge contrasts the exorbitant power, grown up from a small "seminal principle" of the Postmaster General, of which he says: "The great anomaly in the system is the enormous patronage of the Postmaster General, who is invested with the sole and exclusive authority to appoint and remove all deputy postmasters." Finally, in section 798, he adopts to the fullest extent the opinions of Madison and others as pronounced in 1789; and declares that "removals from office with a view to bestow the offiece upon a dependent or favorite is an impeachable offense."

That is from Thirteenth Peters' Reports, 242.

Here is another comment made by the Supreme Court in the same case, which is that of ex parte Duncan N. Hennen:

> This power of removal from office was a subject much disputed, and upon which a great diversity of opinion was entertained in the early history of this Government. This related, however, to the power of the President to remove officers appointed with the concurrence of the Senate, and the great question was whether the removal was to be by the President alone—

And so forth.

It was finally determined that the President did have the right to remove such officers.

Mr. President, I am going to give to the Senate a personal experience that has come under my direct observation as to the methods the Postmaster General has resorted to in order to prevent the carrying out of the civil-service recommendations whenever such recommendations did not suit his political fancy. Out in Nebraska there is a little post office which is called Seneca. I have passed through the town on the train, but I have never stopped there. I am not personally acquainted with the men who were candidates at the examination held by the Civil Service Commission to fill a vacancy in the office of postmaster there, but under the order of the President, which I have read, the Civil Service Commission held an examination for eligibles for appointment as postmaster at Seneca, Nebr. There were two men who appeared for examination. It happened that one of them was a Republican and the other was a Democrat. I am not acquainted with either one of them; so far as I know I have never seen either one of them; I never heard of either one of them until this case was brought to my attention. I have no interest whatever in that post office, except, as a citizen of the United States, to see the man appointed who is properly qualified; to see the law upheld and the order of the President obeyed.

An examination was held, and both of these men passed very good examinations; there was very little difference between them—not more than 1 or 2 per cent—but the Republican stood at the top. Under the order of the President, it was the duty of the Postmaster General to certify the name of the Republican for appointment as postmaster, but instead of doing that he sent out his sleuths—his inspectors—to make an investigation.

This was during the war. So a charge was made against the Republican, who was successful, to get him out of the way, that he was pro-German. It was first stated that this man had said that the President and his Cabinet ought to be hanged, or something to that effect. Later, according to their story, it developed that he had not said it, but that he was present when somebody else had said it, and that he had not done anything about it. It was also stated that he had not contributed to the Red Cross, that he had not bought bonds, and so forth.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to remind the Senator from Nebraska of the fact that on one occasion, in Illinois, I believe it was, a clerk in a post office was dismissed for having criticized the President, and the President commanded that he be reinstated immediately, which was done.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have no doubt that such an instance occurred; but let me go on with this case.

The inspectors went out and, I suppose, made their report. The result was that the Postmaster General certified to the President for appointment the man who was second on the list—the Democrat. The President made the appointment, the appointee was confirmed by the Senate, and I presume that he is now the postmaster at Seneca. I have not anything in the world against him; he may be an excellent postmaster; I am not making any charge whatever against him; I have no acquaintance with him, and I am finding no fault with him.

That was all done and all accomplished before the Republican, who was at the top of the list, knew that any charges had been preferred against him. If there were charges, they had been preferred in the dark to a tribunal that had tried him in the dark, without ever presenting the charges, without ever informing him that his loyalty was questioned, without ever giving him an opportunity to defend himself against this serious accusation, which was practically a charge of disloyalty to his Government and to his country. He was tried and condemned without a hearing.

It is only a small matter; it concerns only a little post office; but the post office shrinks into insignificance, Mr. President, when compared with the fact that a fellow citizen—and, I believe, an honest and upright and patriotic citizen—has been found by the Post Office Department practically as being disloyal and has had that kind of a judgment rendered against him. I have not been able to investigate this matter as has the Post Office Department—I have not read their report—and I will tell you why I have not before I get through. So it may be possible that the charge is true; but the point I make is that the man never had an opportunity to defend himself; was never given any information of the charge which was made against him. The investigation which I have been able to make—and I have been as diligent and as fair as I knew how to be in making it—has brought me without exception the report that there is not anything to the charge; that this man is just as loyal as is any other citizen under the flag; that the statements which were claimed to have been made were never made in his presence.

It developed later that this alleged statement was made by a woman; that she made it in the Eastern Star lodge. We are all familiar with that organization, and we all know that it is a high-class organization, and that it is as patriotic an organization as there is anywhere in the United States. The Republican candidate, who stood at the top of the list, was a member of the Eastern Star; and it is alleged that a woman in the Eastern Star lodge said that the President ought to be hanged; that this man was present at the meeting of the Eastern Star and did not do anything to the woman, and therefore was not patriotic and could not be made postmaster.

Not knowing anything about the facts, not knowing the parties, and not being personally acquainted in the town, when the matter was called to my attention I commenced a correspondence with various people, and without exception I asked for the truth. I had some correspondence with the governor of the State, who knows about the matter, and who first called it to my attention. I corresponded with the member of the legislature from that district, with the county attorney of the county, and with other men, and I said to them every time I wrote, "I want to know what is true. Is there anything wrong with this man? Is he guilty of any of these charges of which the Post Office Department say he is guilty?" Without any exception, without any qualification, every reply that I received from anybody gave him a clean bill of health and stated that he was absolutely patriotic and that there was nothing to the story. I found finally what the name of the woman was, and I have here an affidavit sworn to by that woman, the woman who was alleged to have made an unpatriotic charge at the Eastern Star lodge when this man was present. The name of the Republican candidate was Mr. Gilbert. The affidavit is headed:

In the matter of the appointment of Jay Gilbert as postmaster at Seneca, Nebr.

STATE OF NEBRASKA, Hooker County, ss:

Della Hanna (Mrs. J. M. Hanna) being first duly sworn, on her oath deposes and says that she resides at Seneca, Thomas County, Nebr., and that she has resided at said Seneca, Nebr., for more than 20 years; that is, in Seneca and in the country tributary thereto.

Affiant states that she has been informed that in the applications made to the department for the appointment of a postmaster at Seneca, Nebr., a report had gone into the department accusing your affiant and one Jay Gilbert, who is an applicant for the appointment as postmaster at Seneca, Nebr., of disloyalty to the Government. That she further is informed that a report is on file from some of the patrons of said post office at Seneca, Nebr., that she made the assertion in a public gathering in which the said Jay Gilbert was present, as follows: "President Wilson should be shot," which alleged assertion was made at a gathering of the Eastern Star organization, and that Jay Gilbert, who was present, sanctioned said alleged saying, and that a report had gone into the Government alleging that your affiant made said assertion, as well as other unpatriotic language.

Affiant makes this affidavit for the sole purpose of denying said alleged assertion; and further alleges that she has always been patriotic, and that she has one son in the war, who was inducted on the first call, and that her said son has been in Germany and France since September, 1917, and that all the time since about September, 1917, her said son was in the Army of the United States, and that her said son is still in the service with the Army of Occupation in France and Germany.

And further affiant saith not.

Mrs. DELLA HANNA.

Subscribed in my presence and sworn to before me this 6th day of February, A. D. 1919.

A. G. HUMPHREY, Notary Public.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not wish to dispute or question the wisdom of the argument being made by the Senator from Nebraska, but I desire to call attention to the fact that under the civil-service rules in connection with the examination of candidates for postmaster inquiry is made by inspectors in the community in which the candidates reside as to their loyalty, as to whether or not they are temperate, as to whether they pay their bills, and as to the amount of their bank accounts, and this information is used in marking the percentage which each candidate receives. Personally I think it is a very improper method of selecting candidates for postmaster. It is practically nothing more nor less than a police-court investigation, and I do not approve of it; but I thought the Senator would be interested to know that the very thing he complains about as being done by the Postmaster General is now being done by the Civil Service Commission and is an element in arriving at the candidate's fitness for holding office.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not think what the Senator says has anything particularly to do with the point I am now making. However, even if one of those examinations is wrong, it does not add to it any to have two made, one by the Civil Service Commission and another by the Postmaster General.

Moreover, as I said at the beginning, the President was not required under the law to make this order, but he made it. I was glad when he made it. I think he performed a patriotic service when he did it. Having made it and put it into operation, it is the bounden duty not only of the President but of every man serving under him to see that it is carried out in good faith. What I am complaining about, and what I think I am demonstrating is that it is not carried out in good faith but that its purposes are absolutely perverted.

Now, let me go back again to Seneca. I want to read from a letter of one of these men—a man who is a member of the Legislature of Nebraska, and who knows this man personally. I will read just a paragraph from his letter:

We regard Mr. Gilbert as an excellent citizen, a good man; and I am in a position to know that Mr. Gilbert contributed abundantly to the war activities, and was and has been a true and loyal American citizen. We regard it as simply a shame and an outrage that such unfair tactics should have been used in obtaining favors from the Government.

That is a sample of all of the replies I have been able to get from men who know this man. It is charged that he has not contributed liberally enough; and yet, while I have no personal knowledge about any of these things, it is asserted by men who know—and this man says he is in a position to know—that he contributed liberally. I have other evidence here showing that the amount fixed by the committee in the purchase of the third Liberty loan, for instance, was determined there as it was at a great many other places; a committee fixed the amount that every citizen of the county should pay. They fixed the amount that Mr. Gilbert should pay, and he paid it. In the case of the fourth Liberty loan it was done again, and he subscribed for just double the amount that the committee said he should subscribe for. Moreover, his wife was chairman of the local Red Cross, and was very active until she broke down in health; and it was while this inhuman charge, as I believe, was made against him—this malicious charge, I believe—that he was compelled to take his wife to Omaha for a surgical operation. He is a poor man. He was working for the railroad, and was working 12 hours a day during the war.

Mr. President, in this particular case I was anxious to know the truth. As I said, I know nothing personally about the facts, and after I had had some correspondence I went down to the office of the First Assistant Postmaster General. I think every Senator will be interested in this, no matter what he may think in regard to the action of the Postmaster General in this and other cases.

I went into the First Assistant Postmaster General's office and told the man I met in the first room that I wanted to see the First Assistant Postmaster General. I knew, as you all know, that when you go into that room the First Assistant Postmaster General's office is to the right. I was told by the man there in charge that the First Assistant had not yet reached his office. It was then between 9 and 10 o'clock in the morning. I said to him: "Perhaps you can give me the information I want. I want to see the papers in a post-office matter," and he directed me to the left. He said: "The man in there"—giving me his name, and I have forgotten the name—"will be able to supply you with the information"; and I went in, and with the clerk there in charge I had a conversation in regard to this office. He sent out and got the papers. He sat on one side of the table and I on the other, and it gradually began to dawn on me that he was not going to let me see them. In all my experience, either in the House or in the Senate, I never yet called on the First Assistant or any other Assistant Postmaster General or any other official for the examination of papers but that I was given access to them. I said: "Let me see the papers." He had them in his hands. He did not give them to me. I said: "I want to examine the papers myself." He told me some things that were in them. He told me enough for me to know that this woman whose affidavit I had read was the same woman that their inspectors said had used this language in the presence of Mr. Gilbert, but he declined to give the papers to me. He said: "I would rather you would see the First Assistant Postmaster General." I said: "I have tried to see him, and he is not here." He said: "I think he is here by this time," and I went out and tried again, and the man at the door said: "He is not here," and I went back and again I asked the clerk for the papers. He was very gentlemanly about it. I do not want anybody to get the idea that I am complaining about him. He was careful to say that he did not want to have any difficulty, and I assured him that I expected him to obey his superior officer, but that I was there to see the papers, and I demanded them. I wanted him either to give them to me or to refuse, and I would go out; and he said: "Let me go and see the First Assistant Postmaster General," and, taking the papers with him, he went out, and when he came back he said: "Mr. NORRIS, the First Assistant Postmaster General directs me to say to you that you will not be allowed to see these papers," and that was the end of the interview.

Mr. President, as I said, I can not conceive why any Member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate should not be allowed to examine papers of this kind. Particularly is that true of the Senate, where the papers have to do with the appointment of a postmaster, the carrying out of an Executive order of the President, and a Member of the Senate has a constitutional duty to perform in regard to that particular post office as well as every other post office in the land; and it is yet more important, it seems to me, in this particular case, because in those papers I presume was whatever evidence they had upon which to base the charge that this man was disloyal and therefore not fit to be a postmaster in the town where he lives.

So we will not have to go very much further with this Postmaster General and this Post Office Department until we will be able to abolish the Senate and the House and the whole Federal Government and let Mr. Burleson run it. I can not conceive of an honest administration of that office that will conceal from the light a charge of disloyalty made against a citizen of the United States, and, when the charge is made, that will conceal the evidence on which it is based from a Member of the body that has a constitutional duty to perform in reference to that particular office.

Mr. President, on that same day I asked to see the papers in another post-office case, and they were given to me, and I examined them. In that case the appointment had been made according to the certificate of the Civil Service Commission, but the confirmation had been held up through one entire Congress, and was then running through another one, I think. Anyway, it had been held up a good while, I believe, without any reason and without any cause; but I had learned from letters from the locality that notwithstanding the name had come to the Senate and was being held up—and, as I believe proper investigation will show, held up at least with the connivance, if not with the absolute request, of the Post Office Department itself—investigators from the Post Office Department were out in that community. I had learned of it, and so I looked at the papers, and I found there an order from the First Assistant Postmaster General to an inspector. There had been one inspection, and it did not suit them. He was all right, according to the first inspection; but another order and another inspector were sent, and with the order were instructions, and those instructions said that when he got there he should see four men, naming them. Every one of those four men was either a personal or a political enemy of the man who stood at the top of the list in that examination.

I wondered then, and I think I asked the clerk, if they had an inspector in the whole Post Office Department who was so ignorant that when he got instructions of that kind, and found the kind of men he found when he went there, and ascertained that they were enemies of the man, he would not know what kind of a report the Post Office Department expected him to make. He was not directed to go out and make an examination and consult with the people in the community, but was ordered to go out and see the personal and political enemies of the man whom it was desired to disqualify from holding the office.

That is not carrying out the order of the President of the United States. That is not carrying out this order in good faith. That is nullifying it. It is a great deal worse than if they should say: "We will not make that order. These post offices are political plums. We are in power, and we are going to have them." I would have more respect for them than to say to the people: "We have abolished politics in the Post Office Department; we have put it on a competitive basis; we are going to have the Civil Service Commission, a nonpartisan body, hold these examinations," and then when they are held, hold them up, refuse to carry them out, and use the taxpayers' money to find some evidence, if possible, to show that these reports are not right.

I do not suppose they will always be right. I have a great deal of sympathy with what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] says. The Civil Service Commission is not perfect. I realize that. It would be much better if we would amend the law in some places and get it away from politics. It will begin to degenerate more and more just as soon as it gets into partisan politics. I know they make mistakes, and when they are made they ought to be corrected. I would not put upon any community a postmaster whom the community did not want, no matter what the Civil Service Commission said; but, Mr. President, I think everybody will concede that these examinations by the Civil Service Commission have been honest. They have not been made with a view of getting Tom in and Dick out. They have not been made with a view of getting Republicans in and Democrats out, or Democrats in and Republicans out. They have been carrying out this order to the best of their ability. It has cost a good deal of money to carry it out, and yet the Post Office Department, wherever the result does not suit and does not bring a Democrat into an office, trying to circumvent it by various means and prevent the carrying into effect in good faith of the results of the examinations under this order.

It is a peculiar thing that when the Civil Service Commission certify a Democrat at the top of the list it is not necessary for the Post Office Department to go out and make any further investigation. Mistakes only occur when Republicans happen to be on top. Mr. President, it would be much more honorable if they would say, "You can not have the office because you are a Republican, and we want a Democrat to have it." It seems to me it ought to be beneath anyone with any idea of justice in his heart, no matter how partisan he might be, to resort to the plan I have outlined here, that was resorted to in Seneca, Nebr., to charge a man with disloyalty, try him for disloyalty, convict him of disloyalty, and then tell him about it afterwards, or let him find it out in some other way; and even then refuse to let the evidence on which his conviction is based be examined by some one who is a member of the body having a constitutional prerogative in relation to that very office.

Mr. President, there is one part of the resolution that asks the committee, if they find the Postmaster General, in substance, guilty of these charges, to ascertain whether the action was taken with the knowledge or the consent of the President of the United States. In the first place, I can hardly conceive how the Postmaster General could carry on the activity that he has carried on without the President knowing something of it. I can hardly conceive that the Postmaster General and his assistants would do the things they have done unless they knew they would not be punished for them, because they have done a great many things that are of a very serious nature. So on the face of things the presumption, it seems to me, could be fairly drawn that at least in a general way the President must have had actual knowledge of the Postmaster General's activity in regard to the appointment of the chief examiner, and I believe that an investigation will disclose that these various activities, some of which I have mentioned and some of which I have not mentioned for the want of time, were laid before the President in writing by Mr. Galloway, or at least were laid before the Secretary to the President for the President's consideration, and that in answer to that Mr. Galloway had to give up the office.

Mr. President, I am not going to ask for a vote now on the resolution if some Senator would rather debate it; or, if Senators do not want to debate it but would rather send it to a committee, I am willing that it should go to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment for their consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no desire to answer the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, but I am advised that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] wishes to answer some of the statements the Senator from Nebraska has made. I do not think the Senator from Tennessee desires in any way to avoid this investigation, nor do I know of any Senator on this side who has such a desire. I think they rather court it, if the Senator from Nebraska thinks these things ought to be investigated. The Senator from Tennessee indicated to me that he desires to answer the Senator from Nebraska——

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator from Tennessee is not in the Chamber at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Tennessee would not have time, probably, to answer before 2 o'clock. So, with that in view, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over until to-morrow without prejudice, so as to give the Senator from Tennessee the opportunity he desires.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] also desires to say something on the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the resolution to which he has been addressing himself may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am not in the confidence of the Postmaster General; I have been in his office, in the seven years I have been here, but three times. Our relations are not even cordial, for reasons which I shall not state. My relations with Mr. Galloway are most cordial. When I was a member of the Federal Trade Commission Mr. Galloway heard there had been in the past friction among the members of that commission and came to see me about it. He told me of the friction on the Civil Service Commission. He said that the feeling was so great between the commissioners that they could not transact business efficiently, and asked me what I thought he should do about it. I suggested that he go to see the President of the United States and discuss the matter with him. I think the feeling between the commissioners was so great that they almost came to blows.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I have not mentioned that difficulty; but there is not any doubt about that being true. However, that friction did not exist between Mr. Craven and Mr. Galloway; it was between the chairman of the commission, who has resigned and who has been given a position over in Haiti at an increased salary, and the other two members of the commission. There was a great deal of friction between the chairman of that commission and the other two members, Mr. Galloway and Mr. Craven; and it is claimed, and I think an investigation will disclose it to be a fact, that the chairman of the commission was, as a rule, trying to carry out the mandates and the orders and the wishes of the Postmaster General.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have not discussed this matter with the President of the United States. My knowledge I get entirely from Mr. Galloway, and I think that an investigation will show that the resignations were asked because of friction which interfered with their work. I know what that means on a commission, and recently I introduced in the Senate a bill requiring that the chairman of commissions rotate and be elected by the commissioners for a one-year term—the Federal Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all the others. I know of friction in the past on the several boards on account of the chairman. I think you will probably find that the resignation of Mr. Galloway was asked on that account.

I went to see Mr. Burleson when I was first elected to the Senate and asked him how postmasters were named. He told me that the man making the highest mark would be certified, and that nothing he could do or that I could do could prevent it. I asked Mr. Galloway the same question, and Mr. Galloway told me that in all instances the person making the highest mark was certified for appointment as postmaster, unless substantiated charges were made against the successful party's character.

Mr. McKELLAR entered the Chamber.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ought probably to have mentioned one other thing that Mr. Galloway referred to in the statement I read in reference to the amendment to the order proposed by the Postmaster General. There have been a great many examinations held by the Civil Service Commission, and certifications of eligibles made to the Post Office Department, where the Post Office Department has not yet acted. In the meantime, Mr. Galloway charges, and I believe an investigation will prove it to be true, that the Postmaster General seeks to get an amendment from the President to the Executive order, and the President has now in his hands the proposed amendment, which will enable the Post Office Department, in a large number of the cases of these certified eligibles, to get rid of the Republican candidates who have been successful in the civil-service examinations, and Mr. Galloway charges that if the amendment is agreed to, and ordered by the President, it will result, in hundreds of cases, where the eligible certified will not be appointed under the terms of the amended order itself, and that that is only a scheme by which the Postmaster General is trying to get Democrats into office, where, under the original order, Republicans, under the civil-service rules, would get the places.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I would like to state to the Senator from Nebraska that I do not approve of all Mr. Burleson's acts. I am not here defending Mr. Burleson. I am simply, as a matter of justice and fairness, giving information bearing on this question.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. While the Senator from Tennessee was out it was suggested that he would wish to address himself to this resolution, and I made a request that the resolution go over without objection until to-morrow, so that the Senator from Tennessee might have an opportunity to speak on the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I object to the resolution going over.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Nebraska has concluded his remarks, I would like to take a few moments to discuss this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to have some disposition made of the resolution. Does the Senator from Tennessee want to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know about that; but I can complete what I have to say on the resolution in a few minutes. I should like to discuss it for a few moments before it is disposed of.

Mr. NORRIS. I want the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The only thing I have in mind is that if we do not do something with the resolution before 2 o'clock it will go to the calendar. I am willing to have it referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. I have a right to have it referred to the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object to immediate action. I would have been ready to vote on it an hour ago.

Mr. NORRIS. It is now about 2 o'clock.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Nebraska has taken up an hour and a half in discussing this matter.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that, and I am willing that the Senator from Tennessee shall have as much time as he wants.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want but very little time.

Mr. NORRIS. But I do not want to get the resolution tied up by going to the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I simply can not consent that the resolution shall continue to take precedence to-morrow morning. It has had its morning.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am perfectly willing to vote on it now, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. I would be willing to vote now.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] made a request that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. Has he withdrawn his request?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; objection was made. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request that the resolution be referred?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit a parliamentary inquiry. I have a right to have the resolution referred to the committee. It properly goes to that committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that there is now in progress in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads a hearing embodying very many of the charges made in this resolution. It is a hearing upon the nomination of a postmaster in North Carolina, involving a number of cases where the Civil Service Commission have had referred back to it examinations made and reports made to the Postmaster General.

Mr. NORRIS. That does not cover this ground.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It seems to me that that is the committee to which the resolution should be referred.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator objects to its going to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, it will only make it necessary for me to make some motion in regard to it to-morrow. I do not want to cut anybody off, but I want some action taken in regard to the resolution; and there will have to be some action taken at some time, if it is not taken now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am perfectly willing to see it come up, but I am not willing to have it come up and take precedence of and crowd out our banking bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution comes over from a previous day, and under the rules of the Senate will be referred to a committee. It will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to address myself for just a moment to the action of the Chair with reference to the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I understood that the request was made that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] gave notice that he objected to that reference. I take it, then, it is for the Senate to determine where it shall go, inasmuch as the request of the Senator from Nebraska is objected to. If the Senator from Nebraska now moves that it be so referred, then his motion is before the Senate for action. Under the circumstances of the case, the Senator from Massachusetts has apparently been denied an opportunity to be heard on his objection to the reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say, if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] will pardon the Chair, that inasmuch as the suggestion raised by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] relates to a question of order, the Chair did not understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to object to the reference of the resolution. If the Senator from Massachusetts objected to the reference of the resolution, of course the Chair will reconsider the reference.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the RECORD will show that I objected. The first word I uttered was an objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts object to a reference to any committee?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I objected to a reference of the resolution to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, as requested by the Senator from Nebraska, and then I gave my reason for objecting.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think, under the circumstances, I am entitled to make the motion, and I therefore move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is in doubt as to the parliamentary situation at present. The Chair recognized the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], supposing that the matter referred to by the Senator from Nebraska had been finally disposed of. Therefore, technically, the Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, in order to accommodate everybody, as I understand that the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has given notice that he will speak at the close of the morning hour on the treaty, I will yield the floor to him and let him proceed with his speech in regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That does not solve the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. I have the floor now. Nobody can question that I have a right to make that motion now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] had been recognized by the Chair as having the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. But he yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He yielded to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], or attempted to do so. That does not give the Senator from Nebraska the floor. Does the Senator from Tennessee claim the floor?

Mr. MCKELLAR. No; I do not claim the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the resolution submitted by him be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I move that the words "Civil Service and Retrenchment" be stricken out and that there be inserted the words "Post Offices and Post Roads."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to refer to a committee is not subject to amendment by moving to refer to another committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. The morning hour having expired, can we now further consider the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. We can go on, of course, because there is no unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour is closed, but the Senator from Nebraska made a motion which has been entertained by the Chair. A motion may be made after the morning hour expires; but, in fact, the Senator from Nebraska made his motion before the morning hour had expired.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care to embarrass the proceedings if the Chair thinks that, since the morning hour has now expired, the motion can not be put.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes; the motion can be put now.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care whether the Chair puts it now or to-morrow. I do not see any reason, however, why it should not be voted on now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to refer the resolution to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Several Senators called for a division.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and let my vote stand.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate by illness. The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are detained on official business.

Mr. BECKHAM. Has the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. BECKHAM. I am paired with that Senator, and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (after having voted in the affirmative). May I inquire if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have a general pair with that Senator which I transfer to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and I will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 62, nays 22, as follows:

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to announce that during the morning hour to-morrow I shall take occasion to answer some of the statements made to-day by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in connection with the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to address it briefly on some phases of the treaty of peace with Germany now before this body.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. MCLEAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the treaty is not yet before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I desired to have the treaty laid before the Senate, as I understand the Senator from New Jersey is going to speak on that.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut, in order that he may ask that the bank bill be recommitted to his committee. It will take but a moment, as I understand.

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the bill which was under consideration on yesterday, being the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the recommittal of this bill remove from the considertaion of the Senate the question of the appeal that was pending when the Senate yesterday took up the treaty?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the measure referred to by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is not now before the Senate; it is not the unfinished business. The motion by which the Senate agreed to proceed to its consideration on yesterday morning was made before 2 o'clock. If the motion had been made after 2 o'clock and the Senate had had the bill under consideration at the time of its adjournment, it would thereby have become the unfinished business, but it is not now the unfinished business.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Chair understood the question I wanted to propound. If the Chair will permit me, I will briefly explain what I desire to reach. On yesterday the Presiding Officer made a certain ruling; an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair; and the motion to lay the appeal on the table was defeated; so that the appeal was left pending. The appeal had to do with this particular bill. I have no objection to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, but there was a question involved in the appeal which I think the Senate ought to determine. I do not believe the motion to recommit will interfere with that, but I do not want to have any doubt about it. So the question I asked was whether the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, if it prevailed, would take away from the Senate the consideration of the question that was pending when we went into open executive session yesterday on the appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the recommittal of the bill would, of course, take with it all subsidiary motions which arose from the discussion of the bill before the Senate, there being nothing before the Senate to which the appeal or ruling would pertain, the subject matter out of which the ruling grew having vanished.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President. that being the case, I very much doubt the wisdom of allowing the bill to be recommitted to the committee until the point of order shall have been decided by the Senate. It involves a very vital question. The Presiding Officer ruled upon a certain question and from that ruling the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] appealed. That appeal was pending at the time the treaty was taken up on yesterday. I therefore ask the Senator from Connecticut not to move the recommittal of the bill until that question shall have been settled.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I have no objection to the question being settled now, and I will ask unanimous consent that it be now settled.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that in the opinion of the Chair when morning business was closed on yesterday at 2 o'clock the bill then pending went back to the calendar and is not now before the Senate. Of course, the Senate can take the bill from the calendar and recommit it to the committee if the Senate votes so to do.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Chair, but what I said was that I hoped the Senate would not do that until the question of the appeal from the decision of the Chair should have been finally settled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair there is no appeal pending. The point of order would have to be again made, at some future time in order to obtain a decision of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], supposing that the motion could be made and agreed to without debate. If it is going to lead to debate I can not yield further, though I am sorry to interpose.

Mr. McLEAN. I am perfectly willing to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the purpose indicated; that the vote be taken; and then I shall move that the bill be recommitted. I think this bill ought to be privileged either to remain in the Senate or to go to the committee, and the question should be decided this morning.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is unfair to say that the bill is not in the Senate and at the same time that we can not send it back to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yielded to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire to make any motion?

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think I have the right to interpose a privileged motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator certainly has, but the Chair supposed that the motion of the Senator from Connecticut was made by permission of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I yielded very gladly to the Senator from Connecticut, supposing that the motion to recommit the bill would be adopted in a moment, but it has already taken some time, and it is now my duty to move that the Senate go into open executive session as soon as possible to continue the consideration of the treaty. I dislike exceedingly to cut off the Senator from Connecticut. If the Senate wishes to go on and discuss the point of order, of course, it is for the Senate so to decide.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, I desire to say that the Chair has just ruled that the point of order which was before the Senate yesterday is not now before the Senate; that that has passed; and that the only thing that can be brought up now is either the motion just made or a motion to recommit the bill. I think the Senator from Connecticut could move now to recommit the bill without any further debate and have it take that course, because the question is not pending to which we were addressing ourselves on yesterday.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I understand that, and my original motion was that the bill be recommitted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think that would be the proper thing for the Senator from Connecticut to do—merely to renew his original motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. I renew the motion, Mr. President, to recommit the bill, and I ask a vote on my motion.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me before the Senator from Connecticut makes his motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, a motion to recommit will still be subject to the same point of order. If the Senator from Connecticut can couple with his motion a request for unanimous consent, that will leave the point of order without prejudice so that it does not stand as a precedent, I would not have the slightest objection; but I am opposed to allowing the ruling in its present form to stand as the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the trouble is the Senator from Connecticut can not do otherwise than he has done unless he appeals from the decision of the Chair. The Chair has held that the whole matter has passed from consideration as the result of our action on yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. An appeal was made from the decision of the Chair; a motion was made to lay the appeal on the table; the motion to lay on the table was voted down, and the appeal is before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Chair has just held that it is not before the Senate, as I understood him.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Chair just held that it is not before the Senate and has passed from consideration, the bill having been under consideration in the morning hour yesterday.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Chair has held, as I understand, that it has all passed because the motion was made before 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator understands the Chair correctly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Chair holds that the matter is all dead now.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think it is dead. If the bill is taken up, the point of order can be renewed, of course.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It can be renewed to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. If the motion is made to recommit, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has pointed out, the point of order can be renewed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On recommitting the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly it can.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator hold that the bill is not in the Senate, and also that it can not be sent back to the committee? If it is not properly in the Senate, the appropriate thing to do is to send it back to the committee. All we ask is that one of the two courses be taken.

Mr. LODGE. The bill is not in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senate will hold that the bill is not in the Senate, then the committee can go on with it. It is not in the committee; the bill is in the Senate, and the Senate has considered it and amended it.

Mr. LODGE. It is on the calendar, and there has been no motion as yet to take it up.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, will the Senator from Georgia permit a point of order to be made, which, if sustained, will immediately send it back to the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What point of order?

Mr. LENROOT. The point of order that it is not properly before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not, because I think that the bill is in the Senate. I have no doubt the bill is in the Senate, and I have no doubt that the Senate can recommit it. What we ask, and the fair thing to do, is either to let the bill be recommitted or let us consider it here.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that a great deal of debate will ensue on this question, and I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I desire to state that I shall make some observations to-morrow on the pending peace treaty.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I rise, Mr. President, to make response to the numerous criticisms made by the President in his recent addresses on the attitude of certain Members of the Senate who oppose the treaty of peace with Germany and particularly the league of nations criticisms that reflect on the motives, loyalty, and patriotism of men in this body who are conscientiously trying to perform their great duty at this time as consistently as they did during the great stress of war.

The people of the United States have, or should have, a great reverence for the office of President. The influence he wields by spoken word and through the columns of the press of the country reaches to every fireside. Any statement made by him unchallenged is often accepted as fact, and therefore the reputation of those who are pilloried by him on the rack of public opinion may be affected unless unjust statements are corrected. I have no apologies to make to my State or the country for my course in this body. I am not responsible to the President for my acts, but to the sovereign constituency which I have the honor in part to represent.

No one respects the high office which President Wilson holds more than I. No one realizes more than I that vituperation or personal attack is resented by many who believe the President can do no wrong. I came to Washington hoping to work for constructive legislation and policies under his administration, with a firm determination not to allow my judgment to be warped by partisan influences or political expediency. I was soon disillusioned, for I found that almost every great public question was first measured with a political yardstick. Notwithstanding this I voted for every war measure with the exception of Government control of the telephones and telegraphs, which control I deemed unnecessary and unwise.

As time went on, however, I found that to continue to follow President Wilson would compel me to abandon the principles I had long learned to believe sacred and inviolable, and would also compel me to support policies I believed were wrong and disastrous to my country.

I can not support President Wilson's ideas and ideals of treaty making or his views on the league of nations. The attacks made by him on the attitude of Senators on the league of nations, the abuse he and his followers heap on those who do not agree with him and them, the dire threats he makes against those who oppose his views, I can not, in justice to myself or my constituency, allow to go unanswered, even though he does occupy the Executive chair and is the President of the United States.

What I have to say I shall say without personal spite or prejudice, but I shall speak the truth and shall speak plainly of him and his acts.

In my remarks I shall only comment on his work at the peace table, voicing my opposition to what I believe are unwise policies and monstrous provisions contained in both the documents and stating why I can not support them. Let me refer by way of preface to the oft-quoted policies of Washington in his advice to the American people, policies we have always followed, policies that no one has ever had the temerity to abandon, precepts and policies that should be engraved in the hearts and minds of every Senator in this body when considering the treaty proposals now before us:

> Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, then, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendship or enmities.

Thus advised the immortal Washington. Guided by his advice, we have attained a position unequal in history.

On May 16, 1914, President Wilson said:

> It was not merely because of passing and transient circumstances that Washington said that we must keep from entangling alliances. It was because he saw that no country had yet set its face in the same direction in which America had set her face. We can not form alliances with those who are not going our way; and in our might and majesty and in the confidence and definiteness of our own purpose we need not and we should not form alliances with any nation in the world.

In 1915 President Wilson was nominated by the Democratic Party for a second term. His election was demanded by that party on the ground that he had followed the advice of Washington and had thereby kept us out of war. President Wilson himself promised that if reelected he would adhere to "the fixed traditional policy of the United States to stand aloof from the politics of Europe." In his speech delivered at Shadow Lawn, N. J., on September 30, 1916, he said:

> The certain prospect of the success of the Republican Party is that we shall be drawn in one form or another into the embroilments of Europe.

Notwithstanding his unusual boast that we were too proud to fight, we did fight and very quickly proved to the world that we would be the decisive factor in the war. Taking advantage of our dominating position he, without consultation and, so far as is known, entirely of his own volition, undertook on January 8, 1918, to prescribe terms of peace. The first of his terms was, "Open covenants of peace openly arrived at" and his fourteenth, the last, "A general association of nations." The records of this Senate will show that prior to his first trip to Europe in December, 1918, I called upon him for an explanation of his proposed association or league of nations and inquired specifically if he intended "that henceforth we must take part in all political and territorial disputes throughout the world?" I said on December 4, 1918:

> It is his duty as well as ours to act for the people; and, to avoid misunderstanding, it seems to me that the people should be told by him what is the interpretation which he places upon his basis of peace and should be advised to what extent he intends in their behalf to propose a policy which may involve an abandonment of our traditions. All I ask is that the public should be taken into the confidence of the President, that he should afford the public an opportunity to express its views, and, should it appear that there is a pronounced view upon any subject, that he will not run counter to it. It is for such reason that I have introduced my motion.

To my suggestions and inquiries no attention whatever was paid. The President returned from Europe with a draft of a league of nations. Forthwith he resented any criticism of it and he threatened any who opposed it with isolation "upon a shore so high and barren that it will seem as if he had been separated from his human kind forever." His threat did not deter me and others from criticizing his plan for a league. We reminded him that we were all citizens of the United States as distinguished from citizens of the world; that we were nationals rather than internationals; that we had a written Constitution and that it was his and our guide and the measure of his and our authority.

On February 28 last I arose in this Senate and specifically called attention to the fact that under the league of nations proposed by the President Great Britain would have more votes than the United States; foreign powers might exercise some control over our domestic affairs; the Monroe doctrine would be exposed to serious danger and the United States might be called upon to take part in every dispute in Europe.

I specifically asked him if, under the league as proposed, it would become the duty of the United States to make war upon Germany and Russia should hereafter they attack Poland? I also specifically asked him if the league of nations had been in force at the time of our revolution, if France could have rendered us assistance or if it had been in force at the time of our war with Spain we could have rendered Cuba assistance? All such questions were ignored by him, and he made no attempt to ascertain the opinion of the country. No doubt there was a good reason for his failure. Last November the people answered in the negative his call for a vote of confidence and he would not risk another appeal. He grimly threatened that when again he returned from Europe he would have a league of nations so intertwined with the world peace that they could not be separated. In effect he threatened that we would be compelled to accept his league or remain indefinitely in a state of war. While his attitude may have surprised some of you it was no surprise to New Jersey. We had known him as president of Princeton and as governor of the State. In both offices he surrounded himself with the atmosphere of the class room. He was the professor insistent that all about him were students, that all must bend to his will and that his word was law. I challenge anyone to visit New Jersey to-day and to talk to my constituents. What will you learn? You will be told by the vast majority, including many Democrats, that President Wilson is an autocrat, and some of them will tell it to you in language unknown in a Sunday School.

When President Wilson returned to Europe he did so disdaining all criticism and resenting the general opinion that his visits to Europe were a mistake. So obvious was public opinion on this point that he hurried his return. Was he not fearful that it might grow to a demand that he remain in the United States and intrust negotiations to others. His attitude on the league of nations was that of defiance. Though in this, his own country, criticism of his league of nations overshadowed praise, what did he say to the people of Europe? He told them that he had a "mandate" from the people of the United States, a mandate which he could not disobey, and that his league of nations must be established. On April 28, 1919, he said:

> We have no choice but to obey their mandate. But it is with the greatest enthusiasm and pleasure that we accept that mandate; and because this is the keystone of the whole fabric, we have pledged our every purpose to it, as we have to every item of the fabric. We would not dare abate a single item of the program which constitutes our instructions.

Now, gentlemen, what instructions did President Wilson have when he departed for Europe? Have I not shown to you how I tried to urge him to ascertain the sentiment of the country? You all know as well as I do that instead of instructions he had criticisms, and it was because of such criticisms that he threatened his critics in his Boston address with isolation upon a shore so high and barren that it will seem as if he had been separated from his human kind forever. Though he had no instructions, though the people of the United States had repudiated his policies at the preceding election, he apparently convinced the people of Europe that we in this country demanded his league of nations, or shall I say, as many others have, that he secured his league of nations by barter. He returns to the United States and instead of stating that he had fulfilled his instructions, he calmly tells the people that if they will not approve his league of nations they will break the heart of Europe. Why was it necessary to resort to such language? If in Europe he spoke the truth that he had instructions from America, that he had a mandate from America that his league of nations must be adopted, why did he upon his return try to tell us that we must accept it because Europe wanted it, and that if Europe does not get it her heart will be broken? Was he right when he informed Europe that he had instructions from the United States; that he had a mandate from the United States?

I have kept in very close touch with my constituents in New Jersey, and have no hesitation in saying that very few now call him a Democrat. To many he is an internationalist. My constituents view with alarm the steady encroachment under this administration of Federal control over what have always been considered States prerogatives. I will very briefly give a few illustrations to make clear our viewpoint. We have been very jealous of our schools. We have prided ourselves on their efficiency and on our ability to manage them. There is now pending and there has been pending for some time a bill which has had the support of the administration and for which propaganda is being disseminated through the official administration school paper and under which vast sums would be appropriated annually among the States and a Federal department of education would be created. It is admitted that education is a function of the States and not of the Federal Government. There was a time in the past when such admission would have killed the bill on the ground that taxes could no more be distributed for extra constitutional purposes than that they could be collected by extra constitutional means. If to secure taxes by means of a levy on incomes the approval of the States in the form of an amendment to the Constitution was required, is it not plain that to distribute taxes among the States for State purposes a similar consent is necessary, otherwise one State may bear part of the State expenses of another. That is exactly what will happen if the administration educational bill is executed into law. New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania will contribute $41,256,000 of the school fund and receive but $18,972,000. Mississippi, on the other hand, to take an example, will contribute $143,000 and will receive $2,115,000. The danger of Federal control of education must now be apparent to all. The administration even now is disseminating through the schools propaganda in favor of the Smith educational bill. What would it not do if it had actual control, and no matter what may be said to the contrary, control will follow the purse.

While the administration seeks to invade the fields of education, it has already invaded another State preserve—that of our roads. As a result of its activities and legislation, $275,000,000 have been or will be expended from the Federal Treasury. Of that fund New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania contribute $113,437,500 but will receive only $29,591,575, while Mississippi, to use it again by way of example, contributes $385,000 and receives $4,942,961. Had not the public repudiated the Democratic Party at the election last November, every field of State activities would probably have been invaded and so-called State rights would cease to exist. The danger has frequently been called to our attention by Senator KING and others. To some it may seem strange that a Republican should call attention to such a subject. I believe in a strong central government, but I also believe that it must be within constitutional limits. If our Constitution is to be treated as a scrap of paper, if a party, or, worse still, if one man sets himself above the Constitution and assumes that all power and authority are reposed in it or him, our form of government will be in great danger. Just as this administration has tended to merge State governments in the Federal Government, so also has it tended to merge the Federal Government in an international government.

President Wilson and his supporters insist that we must join his league of nations without any reservations other than mental; that we should surrender some of our sovereignty; that it is not only right but that it is our duty to undertake to respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every other nation, even though we thereby preclude ourselves from encouraging others to achieve their liberty, as France did the Colonies during the Revolution or as we did Cuba in very recent years; that it is not only right but that it is also our duty to undertake to preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every other nation, even though as a result of such undertaking it might become our duty to wage war on a nation giving help to people seeking freedom, as France gave help to us and as we in turn gave help to Cuba. They insist that we must agree to place the world in a political strait-jacket and that we must be ready at all times to repel help which may be offered to any unfortunate people who may seek to throw off the shackles of political slavery.

President Wilson has cast the world into a mold. We are part of his mold. So proud are he and his followers of his work that not only must we not disturb or even jar the mold but we must undertake to prevent others from disturbing or jarring it. That which the wisdom of ages has not accomplished he is sure that he has accomplished. The United States is too small for his ambition. It he sees only as part of the world. An international organization, of which, no doubt, he hopes to be the first head, is his goal. In this respect he is like the Bolsheviki. They, too, have an international organization as their goal. Without internationalism they can not succeed, and their most ardent advocates freely admit it. With pleasure must they view the work of our President. If the goal of internationalism is reached, no matter by whom or by what means, it lessens their work. The most important part of their work is done. Their struggle then will be to gain control of the international organization. Now, unless they achieve internationalism, their cause is lost. Mr. Wilson may deny that he is an internationalist, but if a family of nations is created, each member of which is bound to respect and to protect every other member, is not the result clearly internationalism?

Briefly I have tried to indicate to you how this administration has gravitated toward centralization—centralization of the States in the Federal Government and of the Federal Government in an international organization. The majority of the Democrats in my State are of the school that believes in local self-government, in State rights, and to them President Wilson is no longer a Democrat. On the contrary, to them he is an internationalist.

Why do I refer to them? Simply because very many of them view certain features of the proposed league as decidedly un-American and very decidedly contrary to the doctrines of Washington and Jefferson. I have been importuned to oppose such features and time and again have I been reminded that neither of the New Jersey Representatives in the Senate is a Democrat and that therefore thousands of Democrats look to us to voice their opposition and desire to be considered among those who concur in objections which I have been publicly urging since the draft of the league was first made public. The junior Senator from Massachusetts is not the only one who has been requested by Democrats to stand firm for the Constitution and for the principles of Washington, principles which served as our guide for more than a century, principles which President Wilson himself lauded within the past four years and which, when seeking reelection in 1916, he charged the Republican Party with a willingness and even a desire to abandon. Time, a short time at that, has shown how false was the accusation against the Republican Party and how very false were his own protestations of adherence to the principles of Washington; principles, now that the office of president of the world looms on the horizon, he would abandon as antediluvian, while those of us who can not follow him he characterizes as contemptible quitters. If Washington, or Jefferson, or Adams, or Hamilton, or Lincoln could but return to life, would they characterize as quitters those who stand fast to the Constitution, those who believe that our Government can not be changed without the consent of the governed, those who oppose a partnership with Europe and an alliance that would entangle us in every one of its quarrels? You know well that the founders of this country would praise us for being true to their principles and would look aghast at those who would ignore the Constitution and the advice of Washington and would stigmatize as quitters worse than contemptible those who would now tie us to Great Britain and to Europe to sever political ties with which Washington and his noble followers fought and suffered during seven long years.

I have heard expressions on this floor and elsewhere that many of those opposing the league are pro-German, pro-Irish, or pro-Italian.

The suggestion has been made that they had better return to the land of their birth or their ancestors. All will agree that those who do not observe our laws or respect our Government should be punished. Yet the record during the war of the alien races and the descendants of the alien races we have adopted has been sublime, and therefore we should not sweepingly condemn them as a class.

I am well aware that because of my name, some may think that I am of German origin. It is because that neither in me nor in any of my ancestors is or was there any German blood that I had dared demand for all in this country, irrespective of origin, a square deal. The President has stated that he, too, comes from Revolutionary stock. But in studying the record of his ancestry I am somewhat curious to know what revolution he refers to. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it not possible for the occupants of the galleries to obey the rule of the Senate? You are not all strangers. I see you here frequently. It imposes a burden upon the presiding officer that you ought not to put upon his shoulders all the time to call you to order. You have no right, under the rules of the Senate, to manifest your approval or disapproval. As good American citizens, will you not be kind enough to obey the law of the Senate as well as every other law of the Republic?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am proud of my Revolutionary ancestry. I am proud that I belong to the Sons of the American Revolution; my forefathers at all times have been true to the Constitution and to the Government; I did not hesitate to answer the call of my country and to serve in the ranks during the Spanish-American War. This is my country and I am proud of it. For more than two centuries it has been the country of my ancestors on both my father's and my mother's side, and they, too, were proud of it. As an American I resent the aspersions cast on citizens whose parents or grandparents were born abroad. Remove those born abroad and the children of those born abroad and the United States would not be what it is. Aye, cast off only all of foreign origin you would lose a good part of the worthy citizenship of this country; a part which we can rely on to oppose internationalism; a part which naturally is anti-Bolshevik. It is but natural for a man to think kindly of the place of his birth and the place of the birth of his father and of his mother. Those now derided as pro-German and pro-Irish or pro-Italian resent the charge that they are not loyal. Look over the list of our dead and wounded and the number of German, Irish, and Italian names will surprise you. The relatives of such dead and wounded wonder why they are singled out for criticism on account of their origin, because they can not approve of the league of nations in its entirety and because, remembering the many quarrels of Europe, they hesitate to have this country join in partnership and become a party to such quarrels. Many of such men inquire why should they, whose kin fought for the country, be criticized.

In this connection I have in mind an incident that happened at the beginning of the war. A number of townspeople in my home in New Jersey had gathered at the station to say good-by to the boys who had been chosen in the selective-service draft to go to the cantonments to serve in the Army. There was an Italian boy there who had been in the country only a few years and who had refused to take the exemption that was due him. He was standing with the rest of his comrades. The band had ceased playing. People were crying, deeply affected, when this Italian boy suddenly chirped up, "Play da music, by and by we no be here to hear da music." That boy laid down his life for this country in the Argonne Forest. Was he a pro-Italian or a pro-American?

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], about a year ago, had a letter from a major of the One hundred and sixty-fifth United States Regiment, previously known as the Sixty-ninth New York Regiment, describing a raid over the top. In that letter he stated that the commander of the French forces had asked for 50 men of his regiment to join with 50 Frenchmen in the raid. He said, "You would be surprised at the nationality of the men who responded, for they all volunteered when I asked for 50 men, even the kitchen police and the cooks. Out of that number we had several Italians, several of German descent, several Slavs and Greeks. They went over the top. Not all of them came back, many remained there, but the raid was successful and they were praised by the French commander for the service they had rendered. But," he said, "the lieutenant who led those men over the top, while an American citizen, was born in Germany and had two brothers in the German Army."

Was that man pro-German or pro-American?

One day recently I met the colonel of the Three hundred and eleventh Infantry, a regiment that contained mostly New Jersey boys. I asked him to tell me of the record they made. He said, "I have never seen such splendid soldiers. Not a word of complaint at the hardship or suffering. Many men who had come to your country from foreign soil followed the Stars and Stripes with a devotion that was beautiful."

I asked him to write me a letter giving testimony of the service these men had rendered. This is what he wrote me:

> A large percentage of the men of the Three hundred and eleventh Infantry consisted of Americans and many Italians, Slavs, and other naturalized citizens, who came chiefly from northern New Jersey. Many of them could speak but little English. It required hard work and patience to train them in the duties of a soldier, but when we reached the fighting front I felt well repaid for our efforts, for these men fought like veterans. Fear never came into their minds. They would go after machine-gun nests with apparent delight and they would get them, too. Nerve-racking high explosive shells, of enemy artillery, made no impression on them in an advance. Their worth as soldiers is demonstrated in the large number found in the list of men who won distinguished service crosses. As loyal soldiers, good fighters, and brave men, I have for them the highest admiration and praise.
> M. B. STOKES,
> Three hundred and eleventh Infantry.

Were those boys pro-Austrian, pro-Italian, pro-German? No, they were pro-Americans, for they fought for this country; they fought for you and me.

What would we say if citizens of foreign origin who have lost sons or bothers in the service of the United States call attention to the birthplace of our own President's parents and grandparents, and to his recent visit to his mother's birthplace in England? Would we not resent all criticism based on such facts? Any man, who is a man, loves not only his parents, but also the land which gave them birth. In all seriousness I wish to say that if people who do not approve the league as written are to be called un-American and denounced as pro-German, pro-Irish, and pro-Italian, you will shortly hear criticism along the same line of our President, coupled with the charge that he is trying to force on us what is called a British treaty. Many of my constituents are emphatic that the treaty is a British victory and in support of their claim my attention has been called to the proceedings in the House of Lords and House of Commons.

The treaty was presented to the House of Lords by the Earl of Curzon on July 3, 1919. In his presentation address he said:

> It is open to me to say, with a real and accurate knowledge of what has been passing in Paris during the past six months, that the prime minister, by a combination of courage and imagination and by the exer-else of quite unusual powers of conciliation, has often held the balance between conflicting parties, and is largely personally responsible for the contents of that blue volume.

In what I have said I hope I have not indulged in one sentence that could savor of national vanity or boasting. I have preferred to regard this treaty from the point of view of its effect upon the future of the world rather than its effect upon our own people. But it is permissible, perhaps, to point out in a sentence that Great Britain has gained in this war all, and indeed much more than all, she set out to win. Our navy remains at the end of the war intact and unassailed. The principle of freedom of the seas, which is the basis of our national existence, stands unimpaired and unimpugned. The British protectorate of Egypt is provided for in one of the clauses in this treaty.

We are demobilizing our forces, but we can not lay down our arms; we can not disband them altogether. We must still be able to fight for what we have won and be sure that it is not taken from us after we have won it.

In the House of Commons Monday, July 21, was allotted to debate the treaty. I will read a few brief statements from the debates. Lieut. Col. Hilder said:

The outstanding feature of the peace treaty is that it puts the British Empire at the highest point that it has ever reached as regards territory and world influence. Largely by force of circumstances and the leading part which our navy and army took in either breaking down or destroying the enemy we have been left with far greater territory and power than at any other period of our race's history.

Mr. Bottomley said, at columns 628 and 629 of the Debates in the House of Commons, on July 21:

May I compliment the prime minister on the great acumen he showed when he secured Britain as the mandatory of the ex-German colonies, because I believe that before we get on very far with the ex-German colonies the league of nations will come to an untimely end, as every experiment of that kind has done. The same thing was tried in ancient Greece and failed, and what happened then will happen now. No power will enforce their verdict. The noble lord, the member for Hitchin (Lord R. Cecil) says that public opinion will solve it. He said that public opinion ended the war. I thought it was shortage of ammunition. It is possible that when we have spent a lot of money and had a few little wars we shall come out with the German ex-colonies to our credit. At present we owe America £1,000,000,000. Let her take over some of the obligations of Russia to ourselves. Let us see some sincerity in those high principles enunciated so freely on the other side of the water.

Of the appointment of an Englishman as secretary general of the league of nations, Lieut. Col. Murray said, at column 645:

The appointment of Sir Eric Drummond is not only a compliment to the man, but is a compliment of the allied and associated powers to the British Empire, of which he is an ornament. As I read the league of nations, it seems to me that the council and the body of delegates are or will be for some time not very much more than ornaments and that the real work of the league will devolve upon what I may call the pulse of the machine—that is, the secretariat under the secretary general.

When views such as those I have read are entertained in England is it any wonder that many in this country claim that the treaty is a British victory? To those of you who may argue that only the citizens of German, Irish, or Italian origin make such claims, remember that there are among you citizens whose ancestors fought in the Revolution, fought to sever all political ties with Great Britain. If you would know why, read the Declaration of Independence, read that chief among the grievances of the Colonies was that of unjust representation, then perhaps you will understand why I resent, from the very bottom of my heart, a treaty which gives to Great Britain six votes and to us but one, and which obligates us to defend against all external aggression her grasp on Egypt, on India, on Ireland, and all German Colonies. Think of it, gentlemen, this, the country which saved Europe; this, the grandest, the noblest, the greatest country on the face of God's earth, for it is God's earth, even though his intercession does not seem to have been asked by those who prepared the treaty; the country which is second to none, the country without which England would have been defeated, given one vote while to Great Britain are given six. Have you no pride, have you forgotten the Declaration of Independence, have you forgotten the Revolution? What would the men who then died that the United States might be born, say if they could but return and learn that it was proposed to give to the country against which they fought because of unjust representation, six times as many votes as the country for which they died? What would the men who, during the Civil War, died that the United States might survive say if they could but return and learn that it was proposed to give to the country which then plotted in every possible way its destruction and which fitted out against us such vessels as the Alabama, six times as many votes as the country for which they died? No American who loves his country can view with pride an organization in which our voice will be no greater than the smallest and but one-sixth that of a country which, but for us, would have perished.

I am pro-American, one who takes intense pride in his country, one who believes that the principles of Washington, by which we were guided for more than a century and by following which we attained our present greatness, should not be lightly abandoned. If the President and his supporters will but remember that many among those who insist on dissecting his visions trace their ancestry solely in the United States to a time long prior to the Revolution, to a date two centuries prior to the date when any of his ancestors were born within our borders, perhaps he will abandon his charge that his only opponents are pro-German, pro-Irish, or pro-Italian. Before I leave this subject there is one phase of it to which I most earnestly call attention. To the Irish the President said he could not promote their aspirations for independence because their question is an internal one of the British Empire in which he could not interfere. He now suggests that if the league of nations is formed we can insist on a settlement of that vexed question. If it is an internal question of the British Empire what basis has he for his insinuation that if the league is established we can insist on its settlement? How can he reconcile that statement with his assurance to us that the league will have no jurisdiction of any kind over our internal affairs? If there is any theory on which he can bring the Irish question before the league for discussion does he for a moment believe that Japan can not take advantage of the same theory to bring forward her complaint that in our immigration laws we discriminate against her subjects? If the doctrine of unanimous voting is any protection to us will it not afford equal protection to Great Britain? If a unanimous vote is required what can be done for Ireland if England objects?

Unanimous voting is the vice of the league rather than one of its virtues. Unanimity, like the league itself, was provided not for the benefit of America but to insure to the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan the spoils of war, to prevent changes without the consent of each, to make permanent and indissoluble the control of each over its possessions, and to perpetuate the political strait-jacket created at Versailles. Power was centered in the council rather than in the assembly for the same reasons, and this fact is especially clear when article 4 is carefully examined. By that article it is provided that the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan shall, with representatives of four other members of the league, constitute the council. In effect, the four nations whose spoils of war the league, fortified by the doctrine of unanimous voting, insures have four of the nine votes. In the assembly these four nations might possibly be outvoted, hence the council was made all important and powerful. The chance that the four nations might be outvoted in the council is remote, especially so when the manner of selecting the four other members of the league is considered. In article 4 it is provided that representatives of four other members of the league shall be selected by the assembly for membership in the council. There is nothing in the league to prevent a representative of Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, or India from being selected by the assembly. Great Britain has six votes in the assembly. France, Japan, and Italy each has a vote. The nations that have profited by the war have nine votes to start. No one will seriously urge that they can not influence others. What is to prevent them from combining and selecting for the council one as a representative of India, or even two as representatives of New Zealand and India, or even all four as representatives of four of the five British colonies?

The facts that the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan are permanent members of the council; that, because of the necessity for a unanimous vote, the control of each over its possessions can not be altered without its own consent, and that it is possible to select one or even four additional members of the council from the five British Colonies that are members of the league, make more opprobrious the injustice of giving to Great Britain six votes and to our own country but one. What must nations that are not included within the five allied and associated powers or the British Colonies think of a league of which our President says that the assembly is only a debating society and that all power is concentrated in the council, when the league itself designates the allied and associated powers as permanent members of the council and makes possible the selection of the remaining members from representatives of the colonies of one of them? Let me read to you the recent statement of Sir William F. Lloyd, prime minister of Newfoundland, in answer to the question, "Were the representatives of Canada, Australia, and South Africa satisfied with their status in the league?" He replied:

I do not know why they would not be. Our position and status, backed as we are by the British Empire, is far ahead of that of the United States. As far as the British representatives are concerned, their solidarity is complete, and when an agreement is once reached between Great Britain and her dependencies, the whole power and prestige of the empire goes together.

Can any nation not a member of the council, or can any intelligent person, seriously doubt that the league was formed not to promote peace, but, above all things, to insure the spoils of war to the principal allied and associated powers? We receive none of the spoils; our part is that of an insurance company. Our part is a liability, for assuming which we do not receive even a premium, unless we consider as such the privilege of associating with and protecting those who have secured the spoils.

When we insist that we have equal representation with England it does not mean that we entertain any feeling of antagonism. The United States can have no quarrel with her. God forbid that! The Anglo-Saxon nations must stand together to prevent the downfall of civilization. The sacrifice England made in the war was not a selfish one, and we must realize that in reinforcing the long, thin line in France and the great bulwark formed by her navy protected not only her own homeland but our cities and firesides as well. We gratefully and thankfully recognize that. But let not the effort and sacrifice of America be forgotten. It is our hope that out of this war will come complete understanding and everlasting friendship. At the peace table we were willing that others might acquire territories and indemnities. We wished none. The sacrifice of our lives and treasure was our contribution to the cause of civilization, and we asked no reward. Yet we feel that our generosity should not be taken advantage of. We hoped to receive a square deal there, and while we wished no indemnities we most certainly expected no liabilities. Has not England overlooked the Golden Rule? If not why do we find her assenting to the minimum of representation for America while she secured the maximum? The glory of the heroic struggle where the two English-speaking nations fought side by side for a high principle seems to have been lost sight of in the sordid contest of diplomacy, particularly when we find the result of such contest gives England six votes and the United States only one in the league. Does it not arouse suspicion of the success of a covenant based primarily on inequality and injustice?

The President's inconsistencies as well as his view that his league is a panacea for all trouble should make us hesitate to join unless our entry is carefully safeguarded. No doubt questions will arise in the league affecting various nationalities. Let us assume that a dispute arises between the Italians and the Slavs and the league undertakes to settle it. You need have but little imagination to see what will happen in the United States. Here the Italians will urge that our representatives in the league must support the Italian side; the Slavs, on the other hand, will insist that we must support the cause of their kin. Senators and Congressmen seeking election will be asked to pledge themselves to support the respective sides. Think of the Irish question. If the league as proposed is formed can you doubt that the Irish question will enter the arena of American politics? Just so surely as we ratify the league as proposed, just as surely will the Irish question become as acute here as in England. In many States the attitude of candidates for the Senate or for Congress on the Irish question will become the decisive factor in their campaign. Gentlemen, if the Wilson league is approved by you not only will we be involved in all European disputes but elections in this country will turn not always on domestic questions but frequently on the point of view of candidates on foreign questions in no way related to their fitness for office or to our domestic affairs. I have taken a great interest in our public schools. Many of you little know the wonderful, almost miraculous, part the schools have played in welding from many elements a homogeneous citizenship, an American citizenship. It is with real fear that I reflect on how the league will counteract this great work. We know that but few can forget the land of their origin, or that of their parents, or even of their grandparents. It is but natural to cherish thoughts for the land which favored you with your parents or your grandparents. Every time two nationalities in Europe have a dispute those akin to them in this country will become mightily interested, far more so than heretofore, for the simple reason that we will have a vote, perhaps a decisive vote, in the dispute. Every dispute on which we will be called to vote will counteract the work of our public schools to make a homogeneous American citizenship and will rekindle and revive the old nationality of those whose kin abroad are parties to the dispute. So many and so serious are the questions which present themselves in connection with the league of nations that no one man, no matter how gifted, should have been or should be trusted to safeguard our interests. Least of all should we place implicit confidence in a man who but a few years ago denounced those who would entangle the United States in European politics and who now with equal bitterness denounces those who are unwilling to entangle the United States in European politics.

The work of any man, and especially of a man who has so completely changed front in a few years, must be carefully studied. His view that the function of the Senate is merely to consent to any treaty he may negotiate and that we have no right to give any advice can not be too strongly denounced. We are living in a Republic. Not only is it our right to advise, but it is our duty to advise. The Constitution is explicit. The President has power to make treaties only "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Under the Constitution we must exercise our own judgment, and we would not be justified in relying solely on that of the President. Who can say which President Wilson is right—President Wilson of 1919, who believes in entangling alliances, or President Wilson of 1914 and 1915, who expressed the utmost abhorrence for entangling alliances? Will we accept the word of President Wilson of 1915, who publicly applauded the advice of the immortal Washington and who, when boasting that he kept the country out of war, denounced the Republican Party as one which would entangle us in the politics of Europe. or will we accept the word of President Wilson of 1919, who now favors ignoring the advice of Washington and our traditions of more than a century? Shall we take his word that we can now safely abandon the policy which has stood the test of time and enter upon an experiment against which Washington warned us and against which President Wilson himself, until a few years ago, warned us? He would have us trust not only to his word that the experiment can safely be tried, but he even denounces all who even question his interpretation of his international constitution. Whence does he derive the right to speak infallibly on the meaning of the league of nations? There is no provision in it that the interpretation of President Wilson shall be taken as binding and conclusive on all nations. Not a single nation has indicated a willingness to be bound by his interpretation. The league is a contract; the United States, if it joins, will be a party to the contract, and may be surprised, as parties to contracts are daily surprised, when other parties claim a construction of its provisions quite different from what was expected and have the courts or tribunals which exercise jurisdiction agree with such unexpected construction. What is the law? I ask the question with some diffidence, because the President seems to believe that he is the law and that only the foolish and ignorant will dispute his pronouncements. Perhaps it will surprise him to find that even our own courts, while willing to give serious consideration to the Executive interpretation of a treaty, are not bound by it.

In Charlton against Kelly, decided by the United States Supreme Court and reported in volume 229, United States Statutes, at page 468, it was held that while the construction of a treaty by the political department of the Government is entitled to great weight, it is not conclusive upon the courts. If our Executive's construction of the treaty would not be binding even upon our own courts, what must we say of a man who dogmatically interprets a treaty and strives to make the people believe that only the ignorant have the temerity to question his interpretation? If his interpretation is not binding on our own courts does he believe, can anyone believe, that it is binding on other Governments or the courts of other Governments, or the council or the assembly of the league of nations?

In Hauenstein against Lynham, decided by the Supreme Court and reported in One hundredth United States, at page 487, it was held that where a treaty admits of two constructions, one restrictive as to rights that may be claimed under it, and the other liberal, the latter is to be preferred. By the language of article 10 of the league of nations the United States and every other nation explicitly undertakes to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league, and though in such article the undertaking itself is classed as an obligation the President has tried to lead the public to believe that we are not definitely committed to anything. Even if in face of the use in the article of the words "undertake" and "obligation" there could be any doubt as to the rights of the parties to the treaty under the rules of construction enunciated by our Supreme Court, a liberal rather than restrictive construction of rights must be adopted, that is, we could claim from the others protection against external aggression and they could claim from us similar protection.

When pressed for an explanation of article 10 the President admitted that it did amount to an undertaking and that an obligation was incurred by us to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other members of the league. The obligation, however, he said, was merely moral, as though we, a people who believe in a God, who believe that moral obligations are just as binding, even more so, than legal, would resort to casuistry to defeat performance. Yet that apparently is what he suggests. He expounded his standard of ethics. According to him, one who incurs a moral obligation may exercise his judgment as to whether he will or will not perform it when the time for performance arrives. According to his philosophy you are not bound to perform if it is not then expedient. You all recall his language, and herein lies the true explanation of his mind and heart. This philosophy indicates that he is bound by no promise that he makes or principle that he enunciates. He sees nothing inconsistent between his statement in 1914 that, to use his own language, "in our might and majesty and in the confidence and definiteness of our own purpose, we need not and we should not form alliances with any nation in the world," and his present advocacy of an entangling alliance. He sees nothing inconsistent between his explicit statement made in September of last year that "there can be no league or alliance or special covenants and understandings within the general and common family of the league of nations" and the special treaty of alliance with France separate and apart from the general and common league and in addition thereto.

In 1914 he believed, or shall I say he deemed it expedient, to preach freedom from entangling alliances. Now he believes, or shall I not say he deems it expedient, to preach entangling alliances. In September, 1916, he denounced the Republican Party as a party that if elected would certainly draw us "in one form or another into the embroilments of Europe." In 1919 he denounces the same party because it will not consent to be drawn into the embroilments of Europe. In 1914 he praised the United States as "a Nation that neither sits in judgment upon others nor is disturbed in her own counsel." A few days ago at Minneapolis he said of the United States: "We are the predestined mediators of mankind." Numerous other examples might be cited to show that the President has no fixed principles, in fact that he is as variable as the weather. How otherwise can you explain his casuistry that even though you are morally bound to fulfill a promise still you are free to exercise your judgment as to whether you will or will not perform when the time for performance arrives? How otherwise can you explain his denunciation of the Republican Party in 1916 as one that would involve us in the embroilments of Europe and his denunciation less than three years later of the same party because it will not involve us in the embroilments of Europe?

In his most recent speeches he ignores his former statements that under article 10 we incur only a moral obligation and that performance is dependent on the exercise of judgment. Now he argues that under article 10 the council merely advises, that we need not join in the advice, or if our representative does join, that as it is only advice we need not follow it. Article 10 creates an obligation. That fact the President admits; that fact is now generally admitted. The United States has never broken an obligation. It has always performed its obligations. Heretofore, and I trust henceforth, it has been our policy to say what we mean and to mean what we say. If we obligate ourselves to preserve as against external aggression the political integrity and political independence of other nations, we must do so unless we wish to swerve from the path of honor and abandon our traditions. If we obligate ourselves in favor of other nations, we must do whatever is necessary to fulfill our obligations or we will be called, to use the President's own language, "contemptible quitters." If the council advise a course of action and as the President implies we may ignore the advice and do nothing, what will the world say of us? What would you say of a man who made you a promise, who failed to keep it, and who ignored the advice of others who made similar promises? Expediency has been the watchword of the President. He has ever been ready to change his course, denounce that which he praised, praise that which he denounced, and shift from one position to another. Expediency may guide the diplomacy of Europe. The United States, however, is a Nation of strong moral fiber, a Nation of high ideals, a Nation which when it gives its word means to keep it and will keep it. To our people as a whole expediency is abhorrent. They demand that any promise which is given must be kept, and that the time to determine what we will perform is before rather than after we have given our word. I know the moral fiber of my constituents and with emphasis I declare that they wish the question of performance seriously considered now, and that they want no promise given if there is any doubt about our willingness to perform when the time arrives. They view, as I do, a promise as something sacred as an obligation to be performed, and they and I despise those who would nullify promises by casuistry or refuse to perform on the ground of expediency. More than a century ago the famous Chancellor Kent wrote:

> Treaties of every kind are to receive a fair and liberal interpretation according to the intention of the contracting parties, and are to be kept with the most scrupulous good faith. Their meaning is to be ascertained by the same rules of construction and course of reasoning which we apply to the interpretation of private contracts.

His advice that all treaties must be kept "with the most scrupulous good faith," like the advice of Washington to avoid entangling alliances, we have closely followed. For more than a century the policy of keeping treaties with the most scrupulous good faith and of avoiding entangling alliances has been entrenched in our Government as firmly as if written in the Constitution, and the moral and political sense of our people recoils from the advice of President Wilson to enter entangling alliances and henceforth to view treaties, not from the standpoint of good faith, but from that of expediency.

Doubtless you notice that Chancellor Kent has also said of treaties:

> Their meaning is to be ascertained by the same rules of construction and course of reasoning which we apply to the interpretation of private contracts.

In my business I have frequently heard of the rule that if a contract is open to doubt, the doubt is resolved against the party who prepared it. The law in England is the same as in this country. In the case of Guaranty Co. v Mechanics Co., decided by our Supreme Court and reported in 183 United States at page 418, the English doctrine was cited with approval that ambiguities in a contract are taken most strongly against the person who prepared it. Article 10 of the league of nations is the product of our own President. It is point 14 of his address to Congress delivered on January 8, 1917. I will read point 14:

> A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guarantees of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.

Article 10 provides a guaranty of political independence and territorial integrity. Reading article 10 in the light of point 14 it is evident that Mr. Wilson intended that each nation should give to every other party to the league a specific guaranty of independence and territorial integrity. If there could be doubt the same would be removed by the speech made by him in Boston on February 24 of this year, where he presented the league to the American public. Then he declared that it was our duty not only to sign the treaty of peace, but also to combine with others to make it good and to give assurance to the people of the world "that they shall be safe." By way of explanation and illustration of the necessity of such combination and assurances he said:

> Do you believe in the aspirations of Czecho-Slavs and the Jugo-Slovaks as I do? Do you know how many powers would be quick to pounce upon them if there were not the guarantees of the world behind their liberty?

There can be no doubt but that President Wilson intended, in signing the league of nations, to absolutely obligate this country to defend with its Army and Navy every other nation against external aggression. Now he attempts to limit and define the words "external aggression." In his speech delivered in St. Louis on September 5 he gave this definition:

> Political integrity does not mean that you can not invade another country. It means that you can not invade it and stay in it. I have not impaired the political integrity of your back yard if I walk into it, but I very much impair it if I insist upon staying there and won't get out.

Germany would have given any assurance at the time she entered Belgium that she had no intention of remaining in it and that all she sought was access to France. If President Wilson's definition of territorial integrity is correct, then Germany did not violate the political integrity of Belgium by mere invasion.

Do the British agree with President Wilson on the limitations which he now suggests are so clearly a part of article 10 that only the ignorant and prejudiced differ from him? Mr. Lloyd-George, in presenting the peace treaty to the House of Commons, said:

> Supposing that had been in existence in 1914, it would have been difficult for Germany and Austria to have gone to war. They could not have done it, and if they had, America would have been in on the first day and not three years afterwards, which would have made a great difference, and made all the difference.

If we would have been in the war on the very first day that Germany invaded Belgium, what becomes of President Wilson's theory that mere invasion does not constitute external aggression, that we should wait to see whether there is an intent to remain on the part of the invader, that we need do nothing until the council advises, that the council can not advise unless we join in the advice, that even if the council advises we are not bound to obey, and that in any event our obligation is only moral, and performance is dependent on our judgment. Evidently Mr. Lloyd-George does not agree with President Wilson's casuistry and sophistry.

What said Lord Curzon when he presented the treaty to the House of Lords? I will read a short extract:

> In all cases of international dispute the covenant provides that no nation, however aggrieved, shall take the law into its own hands until the quarrel has been submitted to the council of nations or an international court of justice. Failure to comply with this obligation entails, in the first place, the commercial and economic ostracism of the offending power, and, in the second, such military and naval measures as may be necessary to compel it to observe its obligations.

Will President Wilson deny that what Lord Curzon said follows violation of the league means anything other than war? Lord Curzon and Mr. Lloyd-George played a very prominent part in the peace negotiations and presumably they know as well as President Wilson what was intended. Does anyone suppose that if Egypt or India or any of the German colonies which the British Government will take over is invaded that the British will not insist that we must forthwith cut off all trade relations with the invader and lend such military, naval, and financial support as may be necessary to expel him? If we fail, no matter on what pretext, will we not be accused of regarding a treaty as a scrap of paper? If any further proof was requisite to prove that article 10 means war against external aggression, the special treaty with France provides it. That treaty is designed to protect France in case of another attack by Germany and it is to continue until "the council, acting if need be by a majority, agrees that the league itself affords sufficient protection." Even the Labor Party in England considered that the league will be dependent on force to make its decrees effective.

Mr. Clynes, speaking for labor, said on July 21:

> Even the league of nations, I conclude, will require some strength and some form or manner of physical force behind it, so as to make its decrees effective.

I now repeat the question asked by me on February 28 last. If hereafter Germany and Russia unite in an attack upon Poland, must we be prepared with our Army and Navy to make war upon them? To show that I am not the only one who sees danger of an attack on Poland I will again have recourse to a debate on the treaty in the House of Lords and the House of Commons.

In presenting the treaty to the House of Lords Lord Curzon said:

> Poland has many sympathizers in this country. She has many friends, as recent debates show, in this house. An anxious and a troubled time lies before her. She is beset with difficulties, economic and political. Her territories lie between two powers, the one of whom on the west, Germany, will be inspired by relentless hostilities. On the other side she is coterminus with a State in a condition of equal chaos and disorder. But just as the emancipation of Poland was an international duty, so the protection of Poland is an international interest. The honor of Europe is involved in securing her fair play, and I hope that a bright future lies before her.

In the debate in the House of Commons on July 21 Lieut. Commander Kenworthy said:

> The prospect before Poland, I agree, is terrible. In 20 years' time Poland may find herself wedged in between two hostile countries, namely, Germany, with 60,000,000 inhabitants, and Russia, with 170,000,000 inhabitants. If Poland is not on good terms with those two nations, her position will be impossible. We have there the seeds of a future war.

Now, gentlemen, let us face the situation squarely. Will we be ready to wage war on Germany and Russia if they attack Poland? Will we be ready to wage war in behalf of every Balkan State? Will we be ready to wage war in behalf of every one of the new Balkans which have been carved out of Austria-Hungary? Ask the boys who have been across the sea. Ask their mothers. You know their answer. Should we obligate our boys to do something which we know, if they and their mothers were now allowed to vote, they would answer emphatically in the negative? I have no patience with those who would give the obligation, but reserve to Congress the right to say whether and how we will perform. As well might a man sworn to tell the truth make a reservation that if he tells an untruth he shall not be deemed to have violated his oath. If we promise, we must perform. For one I oppose giving the promise. I prefer—and I know that my constituents prefer—to be free to act according to our best judgment in the event of another world crisis, while in the numerous smaller disputes which may and will arise we do not wish to be entangled. One more word about article 10. It requires us not merely to preserve territorial integrity and political independence but also to respect them. My feeling about the word "respect" can be illustrated by a question asked in the House of Commons on July 16 last. I will read from the official record, volume 118, No. 69, column 163:

> Lieut. Col. Malone asked the prime minister whether he regards the action taken by the United States Senate and other persons or bodies representing the American people in respect to Ireland as a violation of article 10 of Part I (of the league of nations covenant), included in the treaty of peace signed at Versailles on July 28, 1919.

Why was the word "respect" inserted? Does it not open the door to complaints by a nation if we permit agitation within our borders for freedom of any of its colonies or dominions? Who will say that our people can not always show sympathy for those seeking freedom? Why should we agree to an obligation which will expose us to complaints if our citizens act as we know they will act; that is, sympathize with those struggling for political liberty?

Not only do I oppose the entangling provisions of the league, but for the same reasons I oppose our taking part in many of the commissions provided for in the treaty of peace. Why, for instance, should we be parties to a commission on the boundaries of the city of Danzig, or why should we undertake to join in a commission to exercise authority over upper Silesia or east Prussia or northern Schleswig? Time will not permit me to say more on such commissions than that with regard to all European entanglements I will be guided not by the advice of President Wilson but by that of the immortal Washington, whose advice has stood the test of a century, and whose advice, until but two years ago, President Wilson lauded and promised to follow.

There are some misguided citizens who proclaim from the housetops that I and others will not ignore the advice of Washington and the traditions by which to the present day we have been guided solely because of dislike of President Wilson and because of the belief on our part that by opposition we will injure or destroy him and his party. If I did not think of the boys who will have to fight while the President and the Senate remain secure in Washington; if I did not think of their mothers, their wives, and their children; if I did not think of my country, but thought only of the President and his followers and the effect upon them, then, and then only, might I favor the abandonment of our traditions. Such abandonment will embroil us in all the affairs of Europe, and our boys would be over there losing life and limb. For what? Not for the protection of our country or of our citizens, but for the protection of others under an international constitution which our people have never authorized or approved. Our boys are now, without any right or authority, engaged in warfare in Siberia. Only for the decided opposition which we have made to the demand for internationalism, our boys would be in every one of the score or more of wars now waging in Europe. Had we ratified the treaty our boys would have been ere this sent to Armenia to take the place of the British who are leaving there. There is a strong desire on the part of the administration to send our boys to Armenia. The Member of the Senate who boasted of his world citizenship on September 9 introduced a joint resolution requesting authority for the President to use military and naval forces of the United States in Armenia because the withdrawal of British troops will leave them helpless against the attacks of the Kurds and the Turks.

If I was not jealous of my country I would vote for this treaty without any amendments or reservations and I would vote to give the President authority to use our military and naval forces for the protection of Armenia. It is because I am convinced that approval of the treaty means destruction of our beloved country that I will not follow him. Let us try to police Europe, to take part in its struggles, and you will find that those whom President Wilson would expect to shoulder the muskets would decline to do so and their parents would storm Washington with their protests and possibly with something stronger than protests. If any public demand is clear it is the demand that our boys be returned forthwith to their homes and that no more be sent across seas. The lives of our boys are of far more moment than the sordid, mercenary considerations which are being urged in this Senate and by international bankers throughout the land for the league of nations. The public feels, and I feel, that we should devote our energies to our own troubles, of which the Boston police strike and the ominous reception given the President at Seattle are but symptoms. The public is unwilling to enter into an unlimited partnership with nations whose language we do not speak, whose customs and aspirations we do not understand, and whose principles of Government we do not approve. The public is unwilling to enter into an unlimited partnership with nations verging on bankruptcy, nations which desire us to respect and preserve with our blood and our resources the spoils which they have garnered from the war. The league is not a league for peace, it is rather a league to insure the spoils of war.

Aside from the fact that it entangles us in all the broils of Europe, it opens the door to interference by Europe and Asia in all our internal affairs and jeopardizes the Monroe doctrine. So insistent is the public demand that we should not risk foreign interference in our domestic affairs or in any way submit the Monroe doctrine to foreign jurisdiction that I do not feel it necessary to show the dangers of the league. The public wants no risk of any kind on such subjects and I am sure that this Senate has heard and will obey. The same may be said of the right to withdraw from the league. Last spring I was denounced because I called attention to the omission in the league of a right to withdraw. I was told that it was not necessary, yet when the nations were asked to expressly consent to such a right they gave only a conditional one—after two years' notice. Personally I think two years is a very long time to be tied to partners should they prove undesirable, and I believe the public thinks likewise. In any event the public desires no quibbling at the end of the notice as to whether we are in or out, and I am sure that this Senate will make it clear that there will be no question but that if we give notice of a desire to withdraw no nation at the expiration of the notice can claim that we are still a member. On a former occasion I called the attention of the Senate to the insistence of the late Mr. Roosevelt that there are some matters which no self-respecting nation could submit to arbitration. No doubt if a league is ultimately formed some method will be devised whereby in case a nation is grievously insulted it will not have to submit to a continuation of the insult pending arbitration. Take by way of example our relations with Mexico. It is quite true that it is not proposed to admit Mexico to the league at the present time. Should, however, we find it necessary to send troops into Mexico and she appeals to the league, what action will the league take and will such action conflict with the Monroe doctrine? Many of our citizens believe that we should settle our relations with Mexico without outside interference. Once, however, the league is formed Mexico, especially if she believes she will have support from some of the members of the league, will appeal to it should we resent border raids and disorder. The league viewed in the light of Mexico may prove very annoying and troublesome. No doubt the Foreign Relations Committee, if it has not already done so, will give serious consideration to the effect of the league on our relations with Mexico. Should the league take up the Mexican situation, will it conclude that a mandatory should be appointed, and if so, what nation will be the mandatory, or will it be guided by the principle of self-determination? In the light of experience, what assurance have we that self-determination will be a decisive factor even with our own President? Let me recall to you some of his statements.

In an address to Congress delivered on February 11, 1918, but one month after his enunciation of the 14 points, he stated four essentials of any peace. I will read to you the second, third, and fourth:

Second. That peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game, even the great game, now forever discredited, of the balance of power; but that,

Third. Every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as a part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims among rival States; and,

Fourth. That all well-defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe, and consequently of the world.

In his address at Mount Vernon delivered on July 4, 1918, he expounded four great ends or objects for which the war was being waged. I will read his second:

Second. The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.

On September 27, 1918, he restated the ends or objects of the war and enumerated five. I will read the first:

First. The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice that plays no favorites and knows no standard but equal rights of the several peoples concerned.

The ninth of his famous 14 points was:

Ninth. A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality.

The President and his followers would have the public believe that it is only his enemies in this country who criticize the league of nations and who have doubts about its wisdom and perfection. Viscount Bryce is loved and respected not only in England but also in this country. He longs for universal peace as do we all. Of the settlement of the Italian border and the transfer to Italian sovereignty of some 200,000 German speaking Tyrolese alleged by him to belong to the German race he said in the House of Lords on July 16, 1919:

I may add that it is doing a very bad service to the league of nations to start it with injustices of this kind to be redressed. The league of nations is supposed to be based upon the principle of the recognition of the rights of nationalities and the right of self-determination, and to found that league by a treaty which at the same time sanctioned an annexation violating its principles, destroying the very moral foundation on which the league of nations rests, will be a most unfortunate beginning for that project of which we have been venturing to hope a great deal for the future peace and welfare of Europe.

Such language by so eminent a statesman makes me doubt my ability to adequately portray the injustice to China and to fittingly protest such injustice.

In 1898 the Germans, because of the murder of some missionaries, forced from China practically at the point of the bayonet a 99 years' lease of the port of Tsingtau and the Territory of Kiaochow surrounding it. The action of Germany was nothing short of robbery, and I believe is generally so considered. Shortly after the outbreak of the Great War the Japanese with some British troops captured Tsingtau and the German possessions. Since then Japan, notwithstanding the protests of China, has remained in possession. Instead of returning possession to its rightful owner Japan, profiting by the experience of Germany, in turn made demands on China—21, I believe, in number. Unable to cope with her aggressive militaristic neighbor, China yielded. Among the demands was one that Japan should have the right to dispose of Kiaochow in any way that Japan might agree on with Germany. What is the present situation? The treaty of peace provides not only for the transfer to Japan of all the rights of Germany in the Territory of Kiaochow, but also of (see art. 157) "all the rights which Germany might claim," in consequence of the works or improvements made or of the expenses incurred by her directly or indirectly in connection with this territory. Who will define what rights Germany, the pirate, might claim? Is there any limit to what a pirate might claim? Japan has succeeded to this limitless right. Not only is stolen property turned over to some one other than the true owner, but it is turned over in such a way that the successor to the robber may enlarge the robbery. And to think that of us, a Nation priding ourselves on our morality, a President who reiterated time and again that settlements must be just and in the interest of the people directly interested dares to ask our consent. Does not the President wish to abandon principle for expediency? He who preached the right of self-determination approves the transfer of more than 35,000,000 Chinese from the military power of Europe to the military power of Asia. What manner of man is he that he gives as an excuse a secret treaty or agreement for such disposition among France, England, and Japan? Does he think that we have forgotten his frequent denunciations of secret treaties? Does he think that because others agreed to a crime that we must approve it? That he should ask us to approve perhaps is not surprising, when we consider all his statements and how careless he is of facts. At St. Louis, but a few weeks ago, he said:

Great Britain and France, in order to make more certain that Japan would come into the war and so assist to clear the Pacific of the German fleets, had promised that any rights that Germany had in China should in case of the victory of the Allies pass to Japan.

The promise of Great Britain and France to which he refers was contained in the secret treaty of 1917, when Japan had been in the war for three years. She captured Tsingtau on November 7, 1914. Why does the President thus try to mislead the people? Is he not ready to say or to threaten anything to accomplish his end? Why does he not refer to our promises to China to be her friend and to see that justice was done to her at the peace table? Would it not be more honorable to fulfill our own promises than to consent to such injustice and plead as an excuse that others had agreed to the injustice and promised its performance? The President has not been true to China. He not merely tolerates, but approves and asks us to approve a dastardly piece of work in violation of our standards, as well as in violation of his repeated statements of the bases on which, and on which only, peace could be effected. His real excuse, and in this I understand his Secretary of State does not agree with him, is that otherwise Japan would not sign the treaty. If it cost so much to induce Japan to enter, what price must be paid to keep her in? What can we hope for a league conceived in sin and purchased at such a price? If she made any promise to return Shantung to China, where is it? It is not in the treaty. Do you suppose that Japan will perform any representation made during negotiations? Can she not say that all negotiations were merged in the treaty, and that it, and it alone, defines her rights and obligations? If we suggest a secret promise on her part, how simple it will be for her to quote in refutation of a secret compact our President's fifth basis of any settlement stated on September 27, 1918, by way of summary of the essentials of any peace:

Fifth. All international agreements and treaties of every kind must be made known in their entirety to the rest of the world.

This Nation can not stultify itself. It can not, it will not, approve of the restitution of stolen property to anyone but the true owner. Least of all will it consent to the use of stolen property as a bribe.

A grave responsibility rests upon every Member of this Senate in the vote that is about to be cast on the unfair and unequal proposals that are before us. Is the treaty one that we should accept, and should the United States join a society of nations which, whether practical or not, has been presented to us in the guise of an international agreement to promote peace and end all war? The world needs peace; the people of the United States want peace; but they want a peace of justice and honor. The treaty and the league of nations have been considered by the Foreign Relations Committee. We have had an opportunity to examine the text of both documents, yet information as to the reason for certain provisions has been but meager. Papers and documents desired by the committee have been withheld at times peremptorily. Nowithstanding this sufficient information has been procured to show that intrigue, secret diplomacy, territorial greed, and selfishness largely prevailed in the negotiations. There was always a big ten, or a big four, or a big three, and sometimes only a dictator, settling these grave questions. The question that confronts us is not one of political expediency or commercial interest; it is our safety as a nation; it is the future welfare and happiness of the people of the United States.

The situation is not one for compromise. I doubt if for any length of time any league of nations based upon political power and physical force will be satisfactory to our people. Let there be enacted a code of international laws and let there be established a court of international disputes. Such a code of laws and such a court would do more to promote peace than armies and navies and the secret conclave of prime ministers and presidential delegates.

I shall vote for all the committee amendments and I shall hesitate to approve the treaty unless the amendment returning Shantung to China is adopted. That we may incur Japan's displeasure or that England, France, and Italy with their secret treaties made a secret bargain for Japan's help does not sway me. No wrong should be condoned for any nation in the world, and the United States is strong enough in my opinion to say so and should say so.

We made no secret agreement when we entered the war; we asked no reward for the sacrifice of the brave boys who crossed the sea to help France and England. We did say to the world that the right of all people to self-determination and racial existence should be maintained. We protected with our blood the sacred soil of France; now we consent to the domination by Japan of faithful and trusting China, a traditional friend, a friend that has always trusted and respected us. I am unwilling to record my vote in favor of any treaty that surrenders our honor as a nation or casts a blot on our record of fair dealing for nearly a century and a half with every nation on the face of the earth.

As to the league of nations, I shall support all the reservations made by the committee. They are none too strong. I recognize the great desire by many that some form of international agreement be made to promote permanent peace, if such a Utopian condition could be brought about. Yet how futile all human efforts are when commercial greed and territorial hunger blind a nation. Then treaties become scraps of paper and leagues of nations dissolve into ropes of sand. An agreement based upon political power and old-fashioned secret intrigue I view with alarm. An agreement of this character needs what has not been shown in the preparation of the plan submitted to us—better faith, wiser statesmanship, and more sincerity. I have yet to hear that any European nation respects it or relies upon it. That should be sufficient answer to those who dream.

I resent the secret birth of the league. I resent the threats, the coercion, the crafty entwining of it with a peace treaty so that as a rider the great sentiment for peace in America could be capitalized to force it through and circumvent deliberate judgment, public discussion, and understanding by the American people.

There can be no compromise on article 10. Should it remain as written and should the transfer of Shantung to Japan survive, I shall vote against the entire treaty. Article 10 of the league is so radical a departure from our traditions, while the Shantung agreement is so shocking to our standards of morality, that I am sure they do not meet the approval of our people.

We can look back over 140 years of progress and prosperity under a form of government that has adhered to the policy and advice of Washington and Jefferson to keep free from the toils and intrigue of European politics and policies. We are now asked to involve ourselves and our people forever in all European matters, to police the Rhine, to send troops to Armenia, to send them God alone knows where, to leave the safe harbor of experience, to cast aside the chart and compass of the fathers, and embark upon an unknown and tempestuous sea. The siren voice of the idealist calls and the melodious sound is tickling the ear of many men.

For myself, I desire to say that my only mentor shall be my conscience; that my only desire shall be to pursue the traditional policy that has made America great and powerful, so powerful that even in the absence of a league of nations we were enabled to rescue France, England, and Italy, and through the courage of American freemen, not too proud to fight, to accomplish peace with, not without, victory. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. Sergeant at Arms, you will instruct your doorkeepers from this time forward that when the rules of the Senate are not obeyed they shall take from the galleries those who disobey the rules of the Senate.

LABOR STRIKES.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have the Secretary read the resolution which I submitted yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 190, as follows:

Whereas the right of citizens to organize for the promotion of their views and the improvement of their condition and to utilize all means to the attainment of their ends which are consonant with law, justice, and the limitations of the Constitution; and

Whereas this right, long exercised and enjoyed, for some time past has been and is being utilized oppressively, unjustly, and for the accomplishment of aims and objects wholly repugnant to free institutions and to the inalienable rights of the citizen, thus promoting riot, restraining trade and commerce, overthrowing law and destroying order, and imperiling the lives and limbs of the people of States and communities: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we view with deep concern and disapproval all combinations, conspiracies, and disturbancies designed to accomplish objects, lawful or unlawful, by frauds, force, disorder, or resort to other criminal methods.

That in America every citizen, in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, has the constitutional right to follow any calling or to refrain therefrom as he may choose. That this right is mutual and universal, any denial of or interference with which is wholly contrary to free institutions and individual liberty.

That the so-called "closed shop," the denial to the citizen of the right to a livelihood for the support of himself and family free from limitations imposed upon him outside the law are tyrannous, un-American, and wholly in conflict with the fundamentals of American freedom.

That so-called strikes for power, paralyzing business, interfering with distribution, lowering production, defying the laws, and necessarily resulting in riot, insurrection, murder, and the destruction of property are conspiracies in restraint of trade, and should be prevented whenever possible and resisted at all times.

That no person, association, or corporation can be safely or constitutionally exempted or excluded from the obligations, penalties, and prohibitions of general laws enacted for the public safety and welfare.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I intrude this resolution upon the attention of the Senate at this time because it concerns a subject of present importance quite as serious as the treaty which is the subject of discussion. The New York Times of Sunday last published a list of strikes pending in the United States numbering, as I recall, in excess of 211 and outlining 63 others in contemplation which would doubtless be called in the near future. That gives a faint picture of the unsettled state of our economic and industrial affairs irrespective of the steel strike, duly inaugurated after that list was published.

The steel strike is said to involve something like a half million men, of whom it is claimed that more than half have responded to the orders of the leaders. It affects a great basic industry, represented by manufacturing plants and steel furnaces extending across the continent. It therefore involves perhaps half of the States of the Union, and is national in its geographical as it is in its industrial and political proportions. Inasmuch as no strike can be successfully conducted except by resort to violence and lawlessness the spectacle of hundreds of thousands of men engaged in such an enterprise becomes almost the equivalent of civil war; and when to the 300,000 men are added the large number of those involved in 211 strikes of less degree, which in the aggregate are doubtless quite as many more, the situation is practically one of war, and the more serious because the innocent bystanders, the noncombatants, representing the vast majority of the people of the United States, are exposed to all the perils and must bear all the burdens of this intolerable situation.

The steel strike is not a movement suddenly sprung upon the Nation, nor suddenly conceived. It has for a period antedating our entry into the war been threatened, and it seems to have been generally understood that it would occur when conditions were favorable, because this huge aggregation of capital and manufacture has been regarded by organized labor as the one great obstacle to the universal federation of toilers in America, whether justly or unjustly I do not at present care to determine.

The announcement of it was made, as I recall, about 60 days ago, when a number of the brotherhoods engaged in transportation had left their places of employment and very seriously interfered with the operation of the transportation system. About that time the President of the United States announced his intention of calling a conference consisting of representatives of all classes and conditions of our citizenry to consider, and, if possible, discover a remedy which would be reasonably satisfactory to the contending elements of society, upon which they could harmonize and through which we could reassume normal conditions; and the President very properly asked that this contemplated strike be postponed until the meeting of that conference, in the hope that it might find some solution of the situation and thereby make it unnecessary.

The more prominent heads of the labor organization, including Mr. Gompers, recognized the justice of this request and recommended it to those in local authority; and until about a week ago it was hoped—indeed, it was assumed—that the request would be complied with. Notwithstanding this, last Thursday's papers announced that the strike had been called for Monday morning regardless of the wish of the President and in practical defiance of his request. In accordance with the orders thus given, it began on Monday morning, and up to the present time has borne its usual bloody and bitter fruit of contest and of conflict, notwithstanding the leaders who are responsible for calling it assured the public that it would be quiet and peaceable, unattended by picketing or public demonstrations. These, however, were immediately resorted to, and to-day the same leaders are demanding the removal of soldiers and constabulary because, forsooth, it is complained that they interfere with the lawful right of assembly and the right of free speech, rights which the authors of riot and disorder recognize only for themselves.

Mr. President, strikes and industrial disturbances, even when justified by grievances of long standing and intolerable character, are bad enough; perhaps, it may be said that those are unavoidable, although I have never believed that a strike was absolutely essential, since it never settles anything permanently. But behind the present movement are no grievances except those which are ex post facto. They were announced first, I think, on the 19th day of September, the list of which I will call attention to later on. It was stated about the same time that this was a strike for power, whatever that may mean—it may mean much and it may mean little. But I understand it to mean that the leaders will impose their will upon a great industry by forcing a recognition which will lead to the closed shop.

The grievance alleged is that the head of the Steel Trust declined to confer with those representing the unions. I expressed on yesterday my regret—and I do most sincerely regret—the refusal of Judge Gary to meet these men, because it hurts nobody to talk over a difference, and frequently a misunderstanding may be removed by a conference and nearly always clarified with resulting benefits to all. But he did not see fit to do so, and because he did not do so it is said that the strike is a strike of power. If that is true—and of course I must rely upon the press reports for my information—it is the flimsiest excuse in the world, and if it had not existed some other would have been resorted to in justification of the movement.

I have said, Mr. President, that this strike is nation wide. There is a great steel and manufacturing establishment in my State controlled by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. There a request was made upon the manager for a conference, and it was granted—not one, but several. The men were not only invited but were urged to lay their grievances before Mr. Welborn, and they had none of any consequence, none that could not be easily adjusted. While these conferences were going on, however, there came a dispatch from Mr. Foster, the gentleman who seems to be the leader of the movement, and who directs, like a military general, its various movements, both of tactics and of strategy, which instructed them to ask, or rather demand, the following conditions:

1. Right of collective bargaining.
2. Reinstatement of all men discharged for union activities, with pay for time lost.
3. The eight-hour day.
4. One day's rest in seven.
5. Abolition of 24-hour shifts.
6. Increase in wages sufficient to guarantee American standards of living.
7. Standard scales of wages for all crafts and classifications of workers.
8. Double rates of pay for all overtime work and for work on Sundays and holidays.
9. Check-off system of collecting union dues and assessments.
10. Principles of seniority to apply in maintaining, reducing, and increasing working forces.
11. Abolition of company unions.
12. Abolition of physical examinations of applicants for employment.

The committee stated that they had no demands to make except those contained in this bulletin.

Mr. Welborn, the president, says:

We were surprised at this action, in view of the fact that at the regular quarterly conference with representatives of our employees, held in accordance with our plan of industrial representation, Wednesday of this week, no mention was made of the probability of demands being made upon us or of our men participating in the threatened steel workers' strike, and that the matters usually considered at such meetings were fuly discussed and adjusted to the satisfaction of all.

That was upon the Wednesday preceding the 19th of September. I ask leave, Mr. President, to print in the RECORD without reading an article from the Pueblo Star-Journal, entitled "Welborn's statement," together with an editorial from the same paper reciting the splendid condition of affairs existing for a long time between the men and the management of this great concern, that the public may know that this alleged grievance of Mr. Gary's refusal, justifiable if at all only as regards the United States Steel Corporation, has not resulted in any other than the same course where conferences were had, and where every misunderstanding seemed to have been adjusted, until these new and unexpected demands were made.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WELBORN'S STATEMENT—PRESIDENT OF COMPANY DECLINES LAST TWO DEMANDS, BUT MAKES CLEAR OFFER TO TALK THINGS OVER WITH MEN AT ANY TIME—IS SURPRISED THAT LOCAL PLANT SHOULD BE CONSIDERED IN STRIKE QUESTION.

The conference in the office of Manager Frank Parks between officials of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and representatives of the union men employed in the company's steel plant here failed of immediate results, it was announced by officials of the company both here and in Denver to-day.

Both union leaders, other than those connected with the steel workers' union, as well as the great majority of citizens expressed the greatest surprise that a full understanding was not reached between the company and the men at this meeting, as labor leaders openly expressed the view that the labor differences were so slight that the men could not possibly join the nation-wide strike directed against the United States Steel Corporation in the East.

These leaders still express the view that a settlement will be reached, saying, "Is it possible that the employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., whose relations with the company under the industrial plan now in effect have been the talk of the industrial world are going to split over two points, viz:

"Direct recognition and contract with the union (the company insisting upon the present industrial plan) and demand for the 'check-off system,' under which the company would make itself responsible for the collection of all union dues." (This the company also declines to do.)

A reading of the statement by President Welborn printed below will reveal the fact that the company has already complied with practically every other demand included in the 12 demands now made against it, except these two, neither of which Mr. Welborn says, the company can agree to accept, but offers to talk further with the men at any time.

This brings the situation squarely up to the men and to the public, and if those employees of the steel works who are unwilling to go ahead under the present industrial plan of considering and adjusting grievances and disputes still insist that they must have direct union contracts with the company it does look as though there may be a strike.

President Welborn's statement follows:

"Thursday morning a committee of five employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. called on Manager F. E. Parks and showed him a telegram from Secretary William Z. Foster, of the National Committee for Organizing Iron and Steel Workers, advising that the employees of our steel plant, members of the various unions, present their own demands on the company based on the 12 propositions contained in the Iron and Steel Workers' bulletin No. 2, which were as follows:

"1. Right of collective bargaining.
"2. Reinstatement of all men discharged for union activities, with pay for time lost.
"3. The eight-hour day.
"4. One day's rest in seven.
"5. Abolition of 24-hour shifts.
"6. Increase in wages sufficient to guarantee American standards of living.
"7. Standard scales of wages for all crafts and classifications of workers.
"8. Double rates of pay for all overtime work and for work on Sundays and holidays.
"9. Check-off system of collecting union dues and assessments.
"10. Principles of seniority to apply in maintaining, reducing, and increasing working forces.
"11. Abolition of company unions.
"12. Abolition of physical examination of applicants for employment.

"The committee stated that they had no demands to make except those contained in this bulletin.

"We were surprised at this action, in view of the fact that at the regular quarterly conference with representatives of our employees, held in accordance with our plan of industrial representation Wednesday of this week, no mention was made of the probability of demands being made upon us or of our men participating in the threatened steelworkers' strike, and that the matters usually considered at such meetings were fully discussed and adjusted to the satisfaction of all.

"The officers of the company met the representatives of the workmen, some 40 in number, Thursday night. The discussions at that meeting, and with the committee of five previously referred to at another meeting held this morning, brought out free acknowledgment by a considerable number of the representatives and by the committee that their working and living conditions under the operation of the industrial representative plan had greatly improved and were now much better than prevailed at eastern plants; that the treatment received at the hands of the company was fair and that there had been no discrimination against men on the part of the company officials because of union activities. It was also unqualifiedly admitted that the eight-hour day, with one day's rest in seven, except where men requested otherwise, prevailed at this plant; also that no men were required to work 24-hour shifts. It was admitted, too, that wages paid here are, so far as is known, at least as high as those paid by eastern manufacturers.

"Although the 12 points covered by bulletin No. 2 do not directly ask for a contract with union organizations, the committee of five stated that the real object sought by the demands made on us was agreements with the various trade-unions and abolition of our plan of industrial representation. Our reply to the committee's demands was that we were quite willing to discuss with it and representatives of our employees now serving under the industrial representative plan any of the points of bulletin No. 2 which did not involve discontinuance of the plan, but it having been so satisfactory to our employees, as evidenced by the statements from them and their representatives, we could not consider its abolition but would continue to operate our business in accordance with its provisions. The committee answered, in effect, that it could not consider anything except a complete acceptance or rejection of the 12 points and that the real issue being whether or not trade-union agreements should displace the industrial representation plan the union men were willing to test strength with the company on that proposition.

"Much as we would regret to see a strike of our steel-works employees, which would seriously cripple operations here and curtail production of coal, we believe the public and a majority of our employees will approve the stand we have taken. The officers of the company hold themselves in readiness to confer with the employees for the purpose of averting a strike, if possible.

"J. F. WELBORN, President."

EDITORIAL.

The Star-Journal holds no brief for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. This newspaper is practically responsible for the abolition of the scrip system once in use by the company, for the abolition of the monthly pay day, and for the adoption of semimonthly pay days in all departments operated by the company at Pueblo, and an impartial reading of the following statements will prove the fact that they are and will inure to the benefit of employees of the company before they will benefit the company in any manner, shape, or form:

In the first place, the Star-Journal wishes to pay a complement, previously acknowledged, however, to the men of the Minnequa plant in that they have been the talk of the industrial world for many years past. Their peaceful employment, while other industrial centers have been engaged in bitter controversies, has been pointed to with pride by the people of Pueblo and by the whole State which has been proud of the splendid display of fairness and conservatism maintained by the employees of the great plant on which so many other working men and women in Pueblo and southern Colorado depend for their bread and butter. At Minnequa, under the present industrial plan, all has been industrial peace and industrial prosperity. No men in Colorado have been treated any better than the company has treated its men under this plan. This the committee which waited upon President Welborn admits. No army of workers on the globe have been given more help and encouragement along lines of industrial cooperation than has been given employees of the Minnequa plant. In all of its operating conditions they have always been advised and consulted. In all of its plans for improving their working conditions and for their enjoyment and pleasure they have also been consulted. In fact the employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. have practically been made consulting partners through the present plan of industrial representation in effect at the steel works, and yet, it hardly seems possible, these men, who are a credit to the city and State and who are upon the most friendly relations with the company, are being urged by eastern interests to do what?

They are being urged to take a step which, while it will never result in bloodshed, for each and every man employed at the steel works is a peaceful, law-abiding citizen, is likely to plunge the southern half of Colorado into another strike, with the certain loss of thousands of dollars in pay checks to the employees of the works, and the loss of other thousands of dollars in pay checks to other thousands of men who depend on the steel works for a living.

Employees of the steel works have admitted, through their various committees, that the company has met them sincerely and with an earnest desire to do the right thing by them in every way, and just why the employees of the steel works should consent to be advised by outside interests as to what they should do in Colorado when they now have many more favors and concessions than men employed in the East can only be termed a demand upon employees of the fuel company in Pueblo to "pick the chestnuts out of the fire" for the other fellow.

If the employees of the steel works did not have practically every one of the 12 demands made against the United States Steel Corporation, which has no plan of industrial representation at all, they would then have some excuse for following in the lead of eastern men, but the fact that they already have practically everything which eastern men are demanding, it must be admitted, places the employees of the fuel company in the light of walking out to get something which they already have and to sympathize with the men in the East.

The Star-Journal, speaking for a community of people who are as proud of the great plant at Minnequa and of its splendid army of workers, as Pershing was of "his boys" in France appeals to the judgment of the men that it is unfair to them, to their wives and to their families and to the wives and families of other men depending upon the result of their work at the steel mills to think the matter over with that care and judgment of which they are capable, and to take such action as will make sure of a continuance of the pleasant industrial relations under which better working conditions, better wages, more favors, and consideration have been shown employees than ever before in the history of the plant, and to not take any action which will sever those relations or which will cause unnecessary loss of time and wages and which may cause sickness and suffering in joining a movement for the purpose of obtaining something which Minnequa workers already have.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not want to and shall not intentionally make any statement reflecting unjustly upon anybody, and only in so far as probability shall warrant; and if I find in the future that I am mistaken, no man will make retraction more promptly than I.

But I believe, from the conditions as they have developed during the past 10 days, that the principal object of calling this strike at this time was so to disturb and bedevil the industrial conditions of the United States as to force the hand of the President's proposed conference, and compel it to yield to the extreme demands of those who now seem to have the upper hand with American labor. If that should prove untrue, I for one shall be delighted to be appraised and assured of the fact.

I have said that the ultimate purpose is the closed shop. That, Mr. President, is so un-American, so absolutely opposed to all our conceptions of individual freedom, so tyrannous and so damnable, that no man of honest convictions has the audacity anywhere to seriously defend it. It is a denial to the citizen of rights guaranteed by the Constitution and the laws, and sanctified by the recitals of the Declaration of Independence. I have a right as a citizen of the United States, subject to my recognition of the enjoyment of the same rights by my fellow man, to follow any lawful pursuit I please, to work or not, as I may decide, without let or hindrance by anyone except the duly constituted authorities. This is a right basic and fundamental. To deny it is to deny that free government exists.

I know it is said—and there has been much truth to it in the past, and there may be now—that the exercise of this right has frequently been destroyed or denied by vested interests and combinations, and that is true. It is a melancholy fact that every movement characterizing labor conditions in the past few years finds its genesis in similar misconduct organized and accomplished through the power of combined capital. But two wrongs do not make a right, and wrong is wrong wherever it is encountered.

It may be that the misconduct of vested interests in the past sowed the wind, and that they together with ourselves are about to reap the whirlwind. I do not attempt to defend or condone the things that have gone before, or to blink the fact that individual effort and individual opportunity have frequently been strangled in America by other agencies than the closed shop. This I have denounced on many occasions. And there was some responsibility through responsible organization, or the responsibility due to the possession of sufficient means to give assurance of damage. Here, however, we encounter associations organized for excellent purposes—and I have always been in favor of organized labor, as I am now, and want it to continue as it began, for the accomplishment of beneficient ends and purposes by lawful means, not by turning the whole Nation topsy-turvy, interfering with industry, restraining trade, and adding immensely to the high cost of living, to say nothing of the property destruction and bloodshed that inevitably accompany all physical demonstrations to secure by force what should be secured by law.

If a man has not a right to work in this country or to refuse to work except by the consent or at the direction of some outside association, then he is a slave. Slavery does not require that a man be owned by a single master. He can be the slave of an organization, and a far more servile one than if he were owned body and soul by a master sufficiently mindful of his value to take good care of him. I contend that any association, whether it be a combination of men or of money, which denies or interferes with the right of every citizen to work out his life in his own way will nver stand the test of inquiry and should always confront the indignant condemnation of public opinion. It is an old question, Mr. President, and the people of this country have been very remiss in their failure to protect the man who has asserted his constitutional right. Because we have not protected him we are now being punished. From such a sin there can be no remission.

Mr. President, what is a Government worth if it does not extend its protection and laws to every citizen and to all the property within its geographic boundaries? A government which forgets its duty and disregards the rights of its meanest citizen is not fit to be called a government, for as the meanest are protected so will the mightiest ultimately be.

The great body of the American people, Mr. President, are not organized; they are just plain, everyday, obedient, law-abiding citizens. They go about their business, interfered with constantly by these jarring and conflicting demands and requirements, and bearing it all with a patience which, considering the average American animal, is most amazing. There can be no possible compromise between the right of the citizen, subject to that of all other citizens, to do as he pleases and the eternal principle of organic justice, because the two are inseparable.

Yet we have gone our way, and are still doing so, paying little regard to these conditions, thus exposing our vast unprotected citizenship to the wrongs, the outrages, and the injustices of which they are always the victims when the jarring forces of society clash in the endeavor to settle their disputes by the ordeal of civic battle.

Mr. President, we have not only been indifferent, we have actually encouraged this situation. The legislation of the American Congress is directly responsible for the greater percentage of these disorders. We have provided for them, we have invited them, we have encouraged them, by making special exceptions from and giving special privileges under the general statutes of the United States.

The first event of any considerable importance after I took my seat here, Mr. President, was a veto message of the President of the United States aimed at the deficiency bill passed by Congress in February, 1913. It contained a provision that has been grafted into every succeeding similar statute since that date. And we, the Democratic Congress, reenacted this vetoed measure on the 23d day of June of the same year and sent it to the President, who approved it, saying in his message, however, that he did so because he could not segregate the item from the rest of the bill and because there were sufficient funds available to make the exception innocuous, but also expressing the opinion that the statute was unconstitutional. It reads:

Provided, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the condition of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Mr. President, the veto message of Mr. Taft is very short. I shall not, however, at this late hour, take the time to read it, but I shall ask permission to insert it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Let me say, however, that Mr. Taft in that veto message spoke with the inspiration of prophecy, for he outlined every consequence that has since resulted from this policy of exempting classes from general legislation.

May this be inserted, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

The message referred to is as follows:

"To the House of Representatives:

"I return without my approval the bill H. R. 28775, being 'An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.'

"My reasons for failing to approve this important appropriation bill are found in a provision which has been added to that appropriating $300,000 for the enforcement of the antitrust laws in the following language:

"Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof not in itself unlawful: Provided, further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

"This provision is class legislation of the most vicious sort. If it were enacted as substantive law and not merely as a qualification upon the use of moneys appropriated for the enforcement of the law, no one, I take it, would doubt its unconstitutionality. A similar provision in the laws of the State of Illinois was declared by the Supreme Court to be an invasion of the guaranty of the equal protection of the laws contained in the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States in the case of Connelly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. (184 U. S., 540), although the only exception in that instance from the illegality of organizations and combinations, and so forth, declared by that statute, was one which exempted agriculturists and live-stock raisers in respect of their products or live stock in hand from the operation of the law leaving them free to combine to do that which, if done by others, would be a crime against the State.

"The proviso is subtly worded, so as, in a measure, to conceal its full effect, by providing that no part of the money appropriated shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual 'for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the condition of labor,' and so forth. So that any organization formed with the beneficent purpose described in the proviso might later engage in a conspiracy to destroy by force, violence, or unfair means any employer or employee who failed to conform to its requirements; and yet, because of its originally avowed lawful purpose, it would be exempt from prosecution, so far as prosecution depended upon the moneys appropriated by this act, no matter how wicked, how cruel, how deliberate the acts of which it was guilty. So, too, by the following sentence in the act such an organization would be protected from prosecution 'for any act done in furtherance' of 'the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the condition of labor' not in itself unlawful. But under the law of criminal conspiracy acts lawful in themselves may become the weapons whereby an unlawful purpose is carried out and accomplished. (Shawnee Compressed Coal Co. v. Anderson, 209 U. S., 423–434; Aikens v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S., 194–206; Swift v. United States, 196 U. S., 375–396; United States v. Reading Co., Dec. 16, 1912.)

"The further proviso, that the appropriation shall not be used in the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products, is apparently designed to encourage, or at least to discourage the prosecution of, organizations having for their purpose the artificial enhancement of the prices of food products, and thus to avoid the effect of the construction given to the antitrust law in the case of United States against Patten, decided January 6, 1913.

"At a time when there is widespread complaint of the high cost of living it certainly would be anomalous to put on the statute books of the United States an act, in effect, preventing the prosecution of combinations of producers of farm products for the purpose of artificially controlling prices; and the evil is not removed, although it may be masked, by referring to the purpose of the organization as 'to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.'

"An amendment almost in the language of this proviso, so far as it refers to organizations for the increasing of wages, and so forth, was introduced in the Sixty-first Congress, passed the House, was rejected in the Senate, and after a very full discussion in the House, failed of enactment. Representative Madison, speaking in favor of the amendment which struck out the proviso, characterized it as an attempt to 'write into the law, so far as this particular measure is concerned, a legalization of the secondary boycott. * * * The laws of this country,' he pointed out, 'are liberal to the workingman. He can strike, he can agree to strike, he can act under a leader in a strike, and he can apply the direct boycott, but when it comes to going further and so acting as to impede and obstruct the natural and lawful course of trade in this country, then the law says he shall stop. And all in the world that this antitrust act does is to apply to him that simple and proper rule, that he, too, as well as the creators of trusts and monopolies, shall not obstruct the natural and ordinary course of trade in the United States of America.' 'I believe,' he added, 'in the high aims, motives, and patriotism of the American workingman, and do not believe that, rightly understanding this amendment, they would ask us to write it into the law of this Republic.' (CONG. RECORD, p. 8850, 61st Cong., 2d sess.)

"It is because I am unwilling to be a party to writing such a provision into the laws of this Republic that I am unable to give my assent to a bill which contains this provision.

"WM. H. TAFT.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, March 4, 1913."

Mr. THOMAS. I commend that message, Mr. President, to the perusal of every lover of his country at this time. If Mr. Taft had performed no other service to his country, he requited his obligations to it when he wrote that message.

Some time afterwards we passed an antitrust act known as the Clayton Act. I shall not take time, Mr. President, to read this statute, but I will insert, without reading, section 6 of chapter 323 of the laws of 1914, found in volume 38, Statutes at Large, page 731; also a section on page 738, exempting these associations from the injunctive processes of the courts, or seeking to do so, for I do not believe it does. As a matter of fact, however, the statute has been found most potent, because legal restraints by injunctive writ upon lawlessness, when questions of unions are involved, have not been very prolific since that time, however crying the need for legal interference.

Mr. President, when the Clayton Act was before us for consideration, I objected to these exclusions, and I voted against the bill because it contained them. We have no more right, Mr. President, under our oath of office to enact privileged legislation, no more right under the Constitution of the United States to exempt one class of our citizens from the operative clauses of prohibitive statutes, than we have to commit treason against the Nation we are sworn to support. But we have done it, and we are now enjoying some of the consequences. How do you like them, gentlemen? We are to blame—do not forget that—for by the enactment of such legislation we have said to these associations, "Go out and do what you please. You are above and beyond the law. All we ask is that you vote for us upon election day." Inasmuch, however, as each party has outstripped the other in "getting there first," neither has been able so far to reap a decided harvest of majorities. But what a price to pay for political favors.

I dislike, Mr. President, to call attention to such things, but it is time for plain talk, because the country is in danger. The practical construction placed upon these enactments is precisely that which President Taft predicted, and, if I may drop into the ordinary vernacular, they have "got away with it" up to this time. Mr. Gompers said the other day that there were no strikes except when grievances made them necessary. I do not pretend to give his exact words. But the facts are otherwise. Let me read a very short editorial from the New York Times of Monday:

INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRATIZATION.

A manufacturer of jewelry is confronted with a demand for a 25 per cent increase in wages, coupled with a 30-hour week. Under his present high wage scale he is able to make only a 10 per cent profit. Tired out with eternal bickering, he offered to divide this among his workmen, but they refused. He then proposed to turn over to them his factory to be run on the soviet system, offering to give his own services free for six months to induct them into the mysteries of business management. After that he would retire. Again they refused. No doubt they had heard of what happened in Russia to sovietized factories.

The authors of the Plumb plan ask no Greek gift such as that offered by the manufacturer of jewelry. If the brotherhoods run true to the soviet form, their wages continue as usual, but the deficit is borne by the stockholders and bondholders, who are reimbursed, if at all, at the expense of the public.

Then there is something here about the Plumb bill, which I will insert without reading.

A man can pick up a newspaper anywhere in these days and get all he wants about the extent to which strikes have gone. Here is an article from the State represented by my distinguished friend who sits immediately in front of me [Mr. OWEN]:

MOB SEIZES TOWN; DRIVES OUT POLICE—THREE GIRLS WHO REFUSED TO STRIKE HELD PRISONERS WITHOUT FOOD.

DRUMRIGHT, OKLA., September 22.

Drumright to-night is in the hands of a mob, which, having disarmed the chief and members of the police department and driven the latter from town, while threatening the former with death unless he resigned, has warned the Bell Telephone Co. that if demands of the striking telephone girls are not granted its plant will be burned.

Three young women operators who refused to strike are reported to be held prisoners by the mob in the telephone building, where their friends are refused admittance or the right to supply them with food.

The trouble is said to be the culmination of the clubbing of a picket by a policeman this morning.

Now, let us cross the Mississippi and come into Illinois. Here is an article from Taylorville, Ill.:

HOW A LITTLE STRIKE TIES UP SMALL TOWN.

TAYLORVILLE, ILL., September 22.

The striking citizens of Taylorville—railroad men, miners, telephone girls, and others—have brought to Christian County conditions both unique and annoying.

Its annoying alike for the strikers, the employers, and the neutrals. You can't telephone at all, you can't call a doctor or a nurse.

This is not in Russia, Mr. President; this is in Illinois.

You can't order groceries or meat. A local of the United Mine Workers did it by sympathetic strikes. The local is repudiated, but it makes no difference.

They closed a moving-picture theater; they made the merchants refuse to sell to the strikebreakers and railroad officials. The railroad men on the Chicago Midland, a spur road, are out and backed by brotherhoods. Automobiles are only transportation on the 27 miles of spur railroad.

The signal men, the station agents, the telegraphers, the section men, the track walkers went with them. Only about four men, including a detective and the general superintendent, stayed.

Here is another clipping from the same paper, dated September 22, giving an account of the flooding of the gas mains in the great city of Brooklyn, where the lives of literally millions of people were threatened, for the purpose of making the strike good:

GAS-MAIN FLOODS BLAMED ON STRIKE—BROOKLYN UNION CO. SUES FOR INJUNCTION AGAINST FUTURE VIOLENCE, ALLEGING 1,000,000 LIVES WERE MENACED.

Alleging that an attempt was made last week to flood gas mains, endangering the lives of its 1,000,000 patrons, the Brooklyn Union Gas Co. obtained yesterday from Supreme Court Justice Callaghan an injunction restraining the Brooklyn Gas Works Protective Union, which is conducting a strike at the company's plant, from resorting in future to violence or intimidation.

The petition asserted that last Wednesday evening large quantities of water were observed in the mains. The trouble seemed to originate in the Newtown district. A drip pot near Caldwell Avenue and Queens Boulvard showed 3 feet 6 inches of water, though the normal quantity is from 8 to 10 inches. Pumps were worked several hours, but the water receded less than 2 inches. Large pumps, working all Wednesday night, reduced the water to the normal level the next morning.

Officials of the company said yesterday if the water had not been promptly detected and pumped out uneven pressure throughout Brooklyn and Queens would have resulted. Gas jets left burning would have been put out, but the water, constantly moving in the mains would have allowed the gas to flow again through the open jets, perhaps asphyxiating thousands.

Investigation, the officers said, revealed that a water main and a gas main had been connected on Queens Boulevard by a 1½-inch pipe, thus allowing water to flow into the gas main.

The company also discovered the following day, it is alleged, that seven gas meters in a tenement at No. 322 Palmetto Street, Brooklyn, were leaking badly. Investigation, it was said, showed the meters had been punctured in a manner indicating considerable familiarity with such devices.

The company's petition alleges these happenings were a warning that the strikers were in earnest in threats to cripple and tie up the company's service by intimidation and violence.

The union will have until September 30 to file papers opposing the injunction suit.

Meanwhile the company will ask the district attorneys of Kings and Queens to investigate and to prosecute all persons found responsible for the acts alleged.

These are three of many. Grievances? What are they? These are acts of criminal lawlessness grossly subversive of the rights of others and should be suppressed and punished. They are said, Mr. President, to be in the interest of labor. Upon the scaffold Madam Roland cried, "Oh, liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name!" We may well paraphrase her utterance in this morning of the twentieth century by the refrain, "Oh, labor, how many crimes are committed in thy name!"

I shall not worry the Senate by other instances, but there are many, and I fear the list will grow and not decrease unless we do something.

I was greatly cheered yesterday afternoon by reading in the dispatches that the American workers "stayed upon the job." I am informed that the percentage of foreign employees in the steel industry is something over 60 per cent, or about that. But there are many Americans among them, thank God. It is not where a man is born but what he is that constitutes Americanism; and there is many a foreign-born citizen in the United States striking against his will whom I will not insult by comparing with Mr. W. Z. Foster, the leader of this movement, to whom I shall refer presently. Americans stay on the job, and it is to Americans that the country turns in this hour of need.

I know, Mr. President, or I am morally certain, that the majority sentiment of the men involved in these proceedings is against them. My friend, the Senator from Nevada, told me a most interesting story yesterday about the strike recently called in the mines of Tonopah, I think, for a dollar a day increase. The managers of the mine said, "We will make this up to you by securing provisions and letting you have them at such price as will make up the difference between what you think you ought to have and what you are getting."

"Oh, no," they said, "we can not do that. We are men of honor. We have an understanding with the grocery clerks. They have a union. We are looking out for them."

The strike was called, and the strikers got into their own automobiles and rode away from the mines.

A day or two afterwards the governor arrived and took a hand. Gov. Boyle is a pretty level-headed man. After making some inquiry, he suspected that the strike had never been properly called. So he made this proposition: "We will take a vote right here, and every miner will be permitted to vote, and his vote will be counted. If a majority is for the strike, well and good; but if not, then we will see what the governor can do for the enforcement of the laws and the dignity of the Commonwealth."

The vote was taken and stood 6 to 1 against the strike. The leaders, confronted by that result, could not very well prevent the men from returning to work, and they have been at work ever since. I have no doubt that if the same thing could be done in Cleveland, in Pittsburgh, in Youngstown, in Gary, in Pueblo, the same result would follow.

I am interested for the people of these places, the suffering people, and I want to remind the Senate that they vote, too. The noncombatant, the every-day man, who has to take care of himself or perish, when confronted by conditions like these needs, and should have, the moral support of the Congress of the United States by the adoption of some such resolution as the one which I am now discussing. It is little enough that we can do, in view of our legislative record during the past six years, which I do not think can very well be defended, because one consequence of every great disorder of this sort is to turn loose upon the community its criminal and lawless elements.

Take Boston the other day when the police went on strike. Take the experiences of any considerable community of the United States or Great Britain when these conditions are aflame. It is the opportunity of the cut-throat and the thief. Crime of all kinds is rampant and looting flourishes without stint. Society is dissolved into its original elements and every man must be for himself. Naturally in these days when appeals are made to Congress for every sort of relief from every sort of people, let us, so far as we can do it, put the stamp of disapproval upon these conditions and follow it up by repeal of these laws.

The House recently, in a bill now before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, one day eliminated from the pending deficiency bill the provision which I have just read and put it back the next day.

Mr. MYERS. I would suggest that the day it was eliminated it was done as in Committee of the Whole without a record vote, and the day that action was reversed it was done by a record vote in the House.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that is true, Mr. President. How the average Member of Congress in either House bravely votes when there is no record vote and how safely he votes when there is one.

We all know why it was done. Certain labor leaders and agriculturists shook their fingers in the faces of the representatives of the people, and they got down upon their bellies, crawled in the dust, and reversed their action. I hope that expression is not unparliamentary. If it is I will withdraw it. I wonder if we are going to do the same thing? The bill is here, coming out from the committee, Senators, very soon. What are you going to do about it? I hope I shall live long enough to vote as I voted before, although my vote may not amount to much. So far it has not.

Mr. President, this entire difficulty, nearly all the unrest from which this country is suffering, is due to the constant dissemination of false doctrines, appeals to lawlessness, to lust, and to cupidity, made by designing scoundrels to men who are unhappy, who are suffering, or who are discontented. It is the doctrine of anarchy personified, and it has been growing, magnifying, becoming more and more serious during all these 10 or 15 years past while Americans have been treating it with good-natured disdain or with that dangerous optimism which believes that everything will turn out all right after a while. Men who, like myself, are so pessimistic as to express some question about it, are generally bowled over with the indifferent statement that "you are letting your fears get the better of your judgment."

Who are the leaders in this movement, the men responsible for it? One of them is Mr. Fitzpatrick. Let me say again that I hope I will say nothing and make no charge which the facts will not sustain with regard to anybody. Mr. Fitzpatrick, one of the vice presidents or holding some other distinguished office in the American Federation of Labor, ran for mayor of Chicago last spring upon the Labor ticket, receiving the support of Gov. Frazier, of North Dakota. He was interviewed a day or two ago in the city of Chicago and is reported to have said:

> Small loss if some of the men are killed and we win this fight.

Oh, yes. What difference does it make to these leaders, if they win the fight, whether some poor fellow, led away by their dangerous and damnable doctrines, shall expose himself to the weapons of the officers of the peace? What concern is it of theirs if his widow and his orphans, deprived of union benefits, shall become public charges or perhaps be turned out upon the charities of a cold world to find their means of support in the pursuit of lawlessness? What care they if innocent men, women, and children, going about their accustomed affairs, are killed or wounded or mutilated because they happen to come between these pitiless and opposing forces? Is not this the Kaiser in miniature who in 1914, when some one told him of the slaughter of some of his men, said, "Well, we have men enough"? The difference is only in degree; both are pitiless, both are lawless, both are autocratic, and both should with equal vigor be condemned of all honest men.

Now, let us come to Mr. Foster. I preface what I have to say concerning him with the reminder that the American Federation of Labor has said, and has truly said, that it has no sympathy with the I. W. W.'s. Mr. Gompers has repudiated the I. W. W., and I think he did so sincerely, although I am not able to reconcile his statements with his interest in Mooney, who is as bloody and atrocious a murderer as was ever condemned by court and jury, nor with the fact that his organization has elevated this man Foster into high position upon the staff of the American Federation of Labor, although he was identified with that body of men.

Mr. Foster published a book or pamphlet called "Syndicalism" some time ago when he was a member of the I. W. W.; and, by the way, he said the other day that the time would come when the steel workers would enact the laws in Washington. That may be true. Who can say that it is not a prediction to be verified in the near or remote future? I do not know. Organizations of all sorts have gotten along up to this time by telling us what to do, and we have done it. Perhaps it may be cheaper to put us out and do it themselves.

In this book—and I am reading from the very able speech of Mr. COOPER in the House yesterday—he said:

> In his choice of weapons to fight his capitalist enemies the syndicalist is no more careful to select those that are "fair," "just," or "civilized" than is a householder attacked in the night by a burglar. He knows he is engaged in a life and death struggle with an absolutely lawless and unscrupulous enemy, and considers his tactics only from the standpoint of their effectiveness. With him the end justifies the means. Whether his tactics be "legal" and "moral" or not does not concern him, so long as they are effective. He knows that the laws, as well as the current code of morals, are made by his mortal enemies, and considers himself about as much bound by them as a householder would himself by regulations regarding burglary adopted by an association of housebreakers. Consequently he ignores them (the laws and the current code of morals) in so far as he is able and it suits his purpose. He proposes to develop, regardless of capitalist conceptions of "legality," "fairness," "right," etc., a greater power than his capitalist enemies have, and then to wrest from them by force the industries they have stolen from him by force and duplicity and so to put an end forever to the wages system. He proposes to bring about the revolution by the general strike.

That is what he is doing at present.

Again:

> Once the general strike is in active operation, the greatest obstacle to its success will be the armed forces of capitalism—soldiers, police, detectives, etc. This formidable force will be used energetically by the capitalists to break the general strike. The syndicalists have given much study to the problem presented by this force and have found the solution for it. Their proposed tactics are very different from those used by rebels in former revolutions. They are not going to mass themselves and allow themselves to be slaughtered by capital's trained murderers in the orthodox way. There is a safer, more effective, and more modern method. They are going to defeat the armed forces by disorganizing and demoralizing them.

Mr. President, were we correct or incorrect in our forecast of the police union a few days ago?

Did we falsify the facts when we asserted that that was part of this propaganda and are we to shut our eyes in the future to this very sinister condition and permit it to continue? If so, then we are unworthy sons of patriotic sires, for the salvation of this Republic depends to-day upon the present and not future generations, and as we meet these conditions so will that future be.

> Another favorite objection of ultralegal and peaceful socialists is that the general strike would cause bloodshed.
> This is probably true, as every great strike is accompanied by violence. Every forward pace humanity has taken has been gained at the cost of untold suffering and loss of life, and the accomplishment of the revolution will probably be no exception. But the prospect of bloodshed does not frighten the syndicalist worker, as it does the parlor socialist. He is too much accustomed to risking himself in the murderous industries and on the hellish battle fields in the niggardly service of his masters—to set much value on his life. He will gladly risk it once, if necessary, in his own behalf. He has no sentimental regards for what may happen to his enemies during the general strike. He leaves them to worry over that detail.
> The syndicalist is as "unscrupulous" in his choice of weapons to fight his every-day battles as for his final struggle with capitalism. He allows no considerations of "legality," "religion," "patriotism," "honor," "duty," etc., to stand in the way of his adoption of effective tactics. The only sentiment he knows is loyalty to the interests of the working class. He is in utter revolt against capitalism in all its phases. His lawless course often lands him in jail, but he is so fired by revolutionary enthusiasm that jails, or even death, have no terrors for him. He glories in martyrdom, consoling himself with the knowledge that he is a terror to his enemies, and that his movement, to-day sending chills along the spine of international capitalism, to-morrow will put an end to this monstrosity.
> The syndicalist is a radical antipatriot. He is a true internationalist, knowing no country. He opposes patriotism, because it creates feeling of nationalism among the workers of the various countries and prevents cooperation between them, and, also, because of the militarism it inevitably breeds.

Mr. President, such were the former sentiments, the recorded sentiments, the circulated sentiments of Mr. Foster, the head and front of this present disturbance. Is the strike for higher wages? No; but to do away with the wage system. Is it to introduce better conditions of labor? No; but to confiscate the property of others. Is it for the purpose, Mr. President, of making for the ends of industrial peace and prosperity? No; but to keep the revolution going until men like Foster, through his deluded followers, may become in America even as Lenin and Trotski have become in Russia.

The marvel is—upon second thought it is not a marvel—the natural result of such teachings to the lawless, to the discontented, to the discouraged, to those who feel that they have not had the right sort of chance or opportunity in life, assured that theirs is the earth and the fruits thereof, of which they have been robbed and despoiled, is to follow the inclinations of human weakness and temptation, to listen to and to give credence to these unholy statements and join in the movement to wreck the world.

Mr. President, of all the misstatements—and there are many—of Karl Marx the most prominent and that which has done most mischief in the world is his declaration of an uncompromising war or difference between employer and employee. It runs through the whole literature of anarchy. Nothing was ever falser, nothing is more easy to overthrow in the mind of the thinking man.

There are few in this Chamber who have not risen from the lower walks of life, from the ranks of the worker, until, taking advantage of the opportunities offered by America, have attained a seat in the Senate of the United States. I can scarcely recall a great business figure anywhere prominent in America who has not risen by his own exertion through the opportunities of free America and utilizing his talents for his own welfare. This is a land of opportunity, and while capitalism has held it down as labor now seeks to hold it down by reducing the world to a universal level of incompetency, so long as America is America a man will be a man "for a' that," and the employee will discover that the discriminating and observing employer, with here and there a brutal exception, will greet him, take him by the hand, and lift him to higher levels, aid him in his progress upward, and give his aptitudes full opportunity for development.

What I have read from Foster, however, is the doctrine of anarchy; it is the doctrine of I. W. W.ism; it is the doctrine that has turned Russia into a shambles; it is the doctrine which if not overcome may bear its bloody fruit in America. Will we permit these doctrines, Mr. President, to be sown broadcast over the country without challenging them; without emphasizing conditions as they are; without appealing to men, who are men the world over, to take their chances with their fellows and demonstrate that America was not founded for a single century, but for the ages which are to come?

But, Mr. President, there is another consideration to which I will refer briefly because it is closely associated with the theme. Property is said by this class of dangerous doctrinaries to be robbery. I think Prudhomme was the author of the aphorism that all property is robbery. Much property is robbery in these times, but it is impossible for men to conceive a state of society without property. Every right that we enjoy, every liberty that we possess, everything that we have or hope for, law, order, family, the right to pursue our own course undisturbed grow out of the need for assuring to a man that which he earns and that which he fairly acquires. The earliest form of property consisted of live stock, the cattle, the sheep, and the herds that prefigured the days of Abraham. Why? Because they could be easily removed from place to place and thus preserved from the marauder; but as men grew in intelligence and experience and the need for better things and other accumulations manifested itself, men and women came together and made rules for their protection and for the protection of property. When the laws of property shall have been destroyed or ignored or set aside then, Mr. President, the day of organized society approaches its end.

If it be true that the desire to better one's condition—that appeal of self-interest which is quite as prominent in the Bolsheviki as it is in the law-abiding citizen—if it be true that this is the link which holds society together, builds up communities, develops nations, and gives to mankind the impetus of its onward progress, then woe be to the man who would set aside that fundamental condition and shatter governments and destroy the fundamentals of ordered life.

I know, Mr. President, that property has abused, and sometimes frightfully abused, its opportunities, and property should be punished and must be punished accordingly. I know that money's great tendency is to mass and concentrate, and that in such form it is a menace to society. I am aware of all these facts, and society must deal with these evils, while keeping steadily in view the great basic principle that protection to property rights is the cornerstone of liberty and justice.

Without protection of property there can be no protection of life, for then what every man wants, that will he take, if his strength is superior to him who owns it. To do away with that fundamental condition, the foundation stone of order, government, and community life everywhere, is to revert to the stone age, to turn back the wheels of progress, and blot out forever the records of achievement since the first glimmerings of the dawn of civilization.

And, Mr. President, labor's interest is at stake here just as is ours. You can not attack ordered society in the interest of any class without injurying all. Classes exist in some degree everywhere—less here, I hope, than elsewhere—but whenever government assumes a form which recognizes and favors or discriminates against classes in society, every class must inevitably suffer, the one which is favored by the fact, those which are not favored by the discrimination. History proves with unerring exactitude the truth of this assertion, which I have not the time longer to elaborate.

Mr. President, let me refer to another aspect of modern movements. We hear much about rights. Every man recognizing his rights is prone to demand them; every man feeling that he can enlarge his rights is prone to take steps to accomplish that end; every man who believes that some other has a greater right than he is swift to announce the fact and demand it for himself. We have become so obsessed by a consideration of personal rights that we have become practically oblivious of personal obligations. We hear nothing of responsibility in these days of rack and conflict. We forget that each is bound by the strongest of obligations to recognize in every man that which he enjoys. We forget that the highest of all obligations is fidelity to country and its institutions. We forget that those obligations are so strenuous that, if need be, all personal rights, both to property and to life, must yield to them. We forget that in every community these obligations exist, and that without their proper recognition and performance a rift will be rent in the social state which must ultimately result in its collapse. Let us reflect at this time more upon our obligations, and how to perform and be true to them, than assert our rights, unmindful of their pressure upon those of our fellow men.

I was very much reminded of this proneness to regard rights and forget obligations by the recitals in this morning's Washington Post of the testimony of two of the prominent leaders of organized labor before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce yesterday. The subject of discussion was the Cummins railroad bill. It contains, among other things, a section designed to prevent strikes in the operation of our great transportation systems. Mr. Gompers is reported as having said, speaking of the right to strike:

> "I do not wish to live a single day after that right has been taken away from workingmen," Mr. Gompers said with more than a touch of indignation. He served notice on the committee that the antistrike provision, if enacted as law, would not be obeyed.
> "With a full sense of my responsibility," he told the Senators, "I say that I should have no more hesitancy about participating in a strike after its passage than I do now. It wouldn't stop strikes. It would just make lawbreakers."
> "I hold these sections of the bill not only unconstitutional," he said, referring to the antistrike sections, "but also repugnant to the spirit of the Constitution and the Republic."

That may be, Mr. President; but what a spectacle is here presented to the consideration of the American people! Here is a leader of a great organization of millions practically defying the lawmaking power of the Government, and serving notice upon one of its committees that proposed legislation, if enacted, will not be respected. Suppose that Judge Gary, or J. Pierpont Morgan, or John D. Rockefeller, or some other of the great financial magnates of the present day, should come before the committee and make the same statement—what would Mr. Gompers say? What would we say? What would all thinking patriotic men say? Perhaps I should ask what would we think, for some of us are more free to think than we are to speak on such occasions. I know that the indignant public sentiment of the United States would completely repudiate the statement coming from that source. Is Mr. Gompers better than these men? Does he set a noble example to the high citizenship of America when he defies the lawmaking power and announces that he will defy a law if enacted?

If he is right about the question of constitutionality, he has his remedy. If he is wrong about it, then Mr. Gompers should either obey the law or the people should recognize that he is above it, and that our puny efforts at restrictive legislation are too limited in their scope to take in such mighty and prominent dominating figures in the social and political world, living in a sphere and breathing an atmosphere of their own.

Mr. President, I do not pretend to pass upon the constitutionality of these laws. Perhaps they do graze the line of constitutional right; but I can readily understand why it should be necessary to so legislate that the transportation facilities of the country may not suffer serious interruption, even if it be necessary in so doing to place some limitation upon the natural rights of persons. If we should turn these railroads back to their owners, and six months afterwards they should announce that they would not operate them, or permit them to be operated, because they could not agree with their men, their right to do so would be successfully challenged, and they would be denounced, if not punished, for their temerity. Now, what is the difference? If the men who operate the roads, which are semipublic institutions, can not be interfered with in the public interest, who can support the proposition that the men who own the roads must be interfered with if they determine upon a similar policy? Whenever a right or a business becomes so dominant as to affect the public—and the Supreme Court of the United States said so more than 40 years ago—the public has an interest in that right or in that business to the extent that it may regulate it for the public welfare. So, Mr. President, I believe that in the case of a great enterprise consisting of hundreds of thousands of miles of railway, and operating hundreds of trains per day, the very lifeblood of 110,000,000 people, if the Congress of the United States has not the power to prevent interference to the injury and detriment and possible suffering of the people, it ought to have. I believe it has such authority, and I hope it will exercise it.

Mr. President, I had intended, should I have obtained the floor a little earlier, to dwell upon one or two other features of the present very grave situation. I shall not detain the Senate longer, although I may take opportunity at another time to refer again to some features of the prevailing unrest. I think, however, that every man who has done me the honor to listen to me will agree that present conditions can not continue. They will not remain in statu quo. They will either get better or worse, and they will get worse instead of better if permitted to run their course without interference.

There is nothing democratic in existing conditions. On the contrary, the strike, the unions, combinations like the Steel Corporation, all these things are the negation of democracy. They necessarily interfere with the rights of men, and it is for the great body of our citizenship to recognize and act upon that supreme issue.

What boots it if we have a league of nations effective in its authority upon the various nations constituting its membership if civil war shall reign and ravage within their boundaries? What boots it if we are at permanent peace with England and France and Germany and Italy, but are torn in pieces by bloody domestic dissensions and insurrections? How long will our institutions stand the strain?

Macaulay said that the fundamental weakness of the American Constitution was that it was all sail and no anchor, and that when the cupidity of the mass became uncontrollable the final test of American institutions would be made.

Mr. President, this strike will not succeed in the ultimate object for which it was called—the dissolution of the wage system, the conversion of the property of the manufacturer to the employee without compensation, the introduction of Sovietism into the United States. The American spirit is still alive and vibrant in the masses of our citizenship. Every man who loves his country, who believes in her traditions, who has pride of ancestry, whose blood quickens with the achievements of the past, who knows what this country means not only to us but to the world, who carries upon his shoulders the responsibility of citizenship descending from his fathers who formed and who preserved the Republic—these men, Mr. President, will again prove our salvation. I hope the time is not far distant when Americans, whether native or naturalized, whose pulses quicken with the sense of their responsibilities, will rise to the tremendous task confronting them, and forgetting if need be their present petty political divisions and differences, will unite for their country, and forgetting all else, say to these apostles of riot and insurrection: "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the social unrest which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has been discussing, is very interesting and of immediate urgent importance. I do not feel willing to pass by without making a comment upon the remarks which he has been making with regard to it. There is a great reason for the strikes which are taking place throughout the world which the Senator does not sufficiently emphasize. It is the high cost of living and the human suffering due thereto. Even distant Japan has been having riots over the supply of rice, and there was a cause for it. The rice supply was monopolized there, while their scale of living was interfered with by the doubling of the amount of the per capita of gold in Japan due to the war. The wages which before the war would buy the amount of rice needed for life, when their gold doubled in quantity per capita would no longer buy so much, and the Government took the problem in hand and saw that the people got the supply that was necessary and saw that the distress of the people was met at public cost while the profiteering was subjected to public control.

It is all very well to complain of labor, but I want to say to Members of the Senate that this question of the high cost of living has to be dealt with, not from the point of view merely of the greed of the many, but far more from the point of view of the greed of the few and the rule of the few in this country.

I want to call attention to some of the methods by which the minority are permitted to rule, how they are encouraged to rule. At present one-third of the Senate can dictate to two-thirds. The two-thirds rule will be found written all through the rules of the Senate, which means that one-third can dictate to two-thirds, for the alleged purpose of protecting the rights of the minority, but in reality for the purpose of giving a minority veto and not permitting the rule of the majority.

For example, a few days ago the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] brought in Senate resolution 41, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, nominally proposing to liberalize the present method by arranging that amendments passing Congress might be submitted to the electorates in three-fourths of the States, but making no change whatever toward liberalizing the means by which amendments might pass the veto of the minorities in each House of Congress so that the laws of this country should be controlled by a majority of the people of this country. On the contrary, the two-thirds rule is again submitted to us, so that before the Constitution can be amended it must pass two-thirds of the House, two-thirds of the Senate, and three-fourths of the States, in the avowed interest of the minority, but unmindful of the right of the majority to govern this country, which is the true rule that should govern this great democracy.

The Senator who presented the resolution went so far as to propose an amendment so as to read, in line 7, "that Congress, whenever two-thirds of 'the Members of' both Houses." The meaning of the amendment proposed by the Senator in inserting the words "the Members of" is that instead of two-thirds of a quorum, it would require in the Senate and in the House of Representatives two-thirds of the entire membership. If 64 Senators were present, one single Senator could veto the action of 63 Senators under that simple little amendment of three words, "the Members of." The Constitution has been so framed as to prevent the majority of the people of this country amending it, except by war or unanimous consent—unanimous consent as far as woman suffrage, prohibition, and the income tax were concerned, but otherwise by war. You need not complain about the cupidity and greed of the masses. It is the cupidity of the few of the minority, of the 10 per cent, that is the trouble in this country, and I am prepared, for one, to take my part of the responsibility in meeting it. The power of monopoly is overwhelmingly the chief reason for the high cost of living. Unhappily the interference of war with production, transportation and distribution, and the withdrawal of millions of men from productive processes and from distribution, supported in war by the labor of many more millions and the wholesale destruction and waste of war, have made scarce the things which are desired and needed in peace. The expansion of our currency and the currency of other nations has added to it. Waste and destruction have added to it, but when you come back at last to the fundamental problem in this matter, it is because the commercial and financial minorities in this country have exercised undue influence to their own private advantage. That is the great trouble in this country, and it is a cause of social unrest that has to be corrected and will be corrected, because the world is now rapidly moving toward democracy.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to a very important action taken by the Vatican in promoting world democracy. The Vatican was one of the powers that cooperated with the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs in the treaty of Verona (1822) when those dynasties were pledging the destruction of democracy throughout the world. Happily, at last, there comes a powerful declaration from the Vatican in favor of democracy, and I am profoundly rejoiced that it should take place.

The Vatican program contains four definite planks for the establishment of social peace. They comprise:

Cooperation of all classes.

Correlation of all classes against Bolshevism.

Acceptance of democracy.

And—God be praised—the education of the proletariat, because that is all that is necessary to produce peace on earth and good will to men and to enable the Christian churches to fulfill their glorious mission.

The ordinary man is not unduly selfish. The great body of our citizenship in this country is composed of God-fearing and man-loving people, who want to do nothing in the world but what is right. But they know, and they deeply and profoundly feel, that they are being imposed on in some way, and that they are not being fairly dealt with in the prices that are charged for the things that are necessary to their lives. It is charged that they can not get meat at fair prices because of the Meat Trust. They can not get clothes at fair prices because of the trust in woolen goods, in linen goods, in leather, and in all sorts of things. It is authoritatively reported that there are over 10,000 different concerns engaged in monopoly in this country, not only fixing the prices which people have to pay for the things which are necessary to live on, but whose policy is to limit production in order to raise the prices which people have to pay.

What steps has the Senate taken to ascertain the truth of these things and correct them? One or two investigations are proceeding—one of the Beef Trust—but it is the duty of this body and of this Congress not to pass the problem back to the people but to solve this question and take the responsibility necessary to end the unfair exactions of monopoly in this country. We passed the so-called Sherman antitrust law, making it a crime to be guilty of restraint of trade, and after 20 long years, finally beating its way up to the Supreme Court of the United States, the Supreme Court wrote into that act the word "reasonable," so that a restraint of trade which was reasonable was not obnoxious to the law, and nobody knew what "reasonable" restraint of trade was. That act might as well have been sponged off the statute books. It has been of no value since. Since then monopolies have felt quite safe.

But it has at least taught a lesson to this country that the time has come when Congress should set up a workable administrative method by which to ascertain and determine what is "reasonable."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, what is the Senator's proposition? What remedy does he propose? How is the Congress to set up an administrative body that will remedy it?

Mr. OWEN. I will make a suggestion to the Senator that may illuminate the matter.

Mr. FALL. That is what I am asking for.

Mr. OWEN. The Congress of the United States in passing the national bank act put a 7 per cent rate on capital being loaned out by the national banks, as the maximum interest charge, unless the States provided a higher rate, when it might go to 10 per cent under contract. There is a direct limitation of what may be done by those who have charge of the banking business of the country. It is much too low for commercial enterprises, but there is a point which is reasonable, and there is a point which is unreasonable, and this Congress is, in my judgment, obliged to provide some means for determining what is reasonable and what is unreasonable.

Mr. FALL. What the Senator is complaining about, as I understand, is that under the construction of the Supreme Court of the United States they read the word "reasonable" into the law.

Mr. OWEN. I think the Senator from New Mexico agrees that that word was written into the law.

Mr. FALL. Yes; written in by construction. But what would the Senator have Congress do now? Would he have it fix the prices of all articles?

Mr. OWEN. No. I think that fixing the price of all articles is too involved and too difficult. But I think Congress could provide an administrative method which could pass upon the question as to whether certain prices were reasonable or were unreasonable. Certainly, when it comes to a price that is 300 per cent higher than cost, they might be justified in holding it was not reasonable.

Mr. FALL. What is known generally as the pure-food law is still in effect, and the Attorney General now is proceeding to investigate the reasonableness of prices, is he not?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; and the Congress a few days ago, in amending that act, provided that it should expire as soon as peace was declared, and therefore leaves no remedy on the statute books, even in that limited way; and I think it is very limited and quite inadequate.

Mr. FALL. I am speaking of the conditions now. It may be that the law ought to be continued in effect after peace is declared. But, still, we have the law now, and we had it for two years, and the conditions—if the Senator is complaining of prices, as I understand him to be—have continued despite the fact that this law, which has not yet expired, has been on the statute books for two years.

Mr. OWEN. I think the mechanism is not properly adapted to perform the office which I have suggested. But I will say to the Senator from New Mexico that the method is suggested there, and that method can be worked out if the committees and if Congress will take the matter up and sincerely endeavor to solve this question.

Mr. FALL. Has not the Senator's experience been generally that Congress is ready enough to yield to the necessities of the occasion and the demands of the people and pass such legislation as is demanded, but that, as in the case of the Sherman Act or any other act, it is a question of administration rather than a question of the reasonableness of the action of Congress?

Mr. OWEN. I do not think so.

Mr. FALL. That is exactly the purpose of my question.

Mr. OWEN. I do not think so. On the contrary, I believe that the Democratic administrations and the Republican administrations alike have been exceedingly at fault in administering the Sherman antitrust law, even such as we have, but above all Congress is at fault in not making a workable law.

Mr. FALL. And other laws. That is the exact distinction I am making.

Mr. OWEN. I am talking only about that one law. There can be fault enough found with human agencies of all kinds. But I am only making this comment because I do not want to be silent and have the labor organizations of the country arraigned for the responsibility of disorder in this country, when I know that the disorder is not due so much to the improper conduct or the improper management of these labor organizations, but is far more due to the fact that monopoly is so thoroughly intrenched in this country that when added to it is an expansion of currency, when added to it is the destruction by war of the things people so acutely need, that the conditions become intolerable to those of small fixed incomes and no adequate reserve on which to live.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator intends to quote me correctly.

Mr. OWEN. I did not intend to quote the Senator at all.

Mr. THOMAS. He made reference to the speech I made just now. I merely wish to remind the Senator that I pivoted these conditions upon both causes.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I know. But I got the very painful impression that the Senator inferred that the labor organizations were very much at fault.

Mr. THOMAS. They are.

Mr. OWEN. I think possibly they may be at fault in some of their claims. I am not entirely sure about that, but the monopolies are much more at fault.

Mr. THOMAS. Both sides to the controversy are at fault.

Mr. OWEN. The real trouble in this country is the fact that the country is dominated by a series of monopolies that are unrestrained by law. That is the plain truth about it, and I think the time has come when we ought to know it, or try to know it.

Mr. FALL. In the interruption which I made I was not discussing the labor question at all. The Senator was speaking of monopolies and high prices, and I was asking him simply what his remedy was, and we were discussing, as I understood it, the Sherman Act and the present pure-food law. I had not said a word about labor—whether labor was imposed on or whether labor was not imposed on.

Mr. OWEN. I understand that very well.

Mr. FALL. I am seeking light, because I think we are in rather a serious condition.

Mr. OWEN. I want to say to the Senator that I believe the only way in which we will be able to control these matters is to set up an administrative mechanism that will deal with the interstate commerce, so that these great enterprises—which I commend in the main, because I think they are vital to our civilizarion, and I favor them up to the point where they go beyond a reasonable charge for the services they render—shall be controlled. When they do that I think they ought to be restrained, and I think their policy of preventing production, which I am sure takes place in many cases, ought to be changed also, because the more abundantly these things are produced the more people will be able to get them at a fair price, and the better employed the people will be in providing their necessities.

Mr. FALL. We all recognize that as the truth, and we also recognize, and, of course, the Senator knows, because he is a student of history, as we all know, that the very question which he is now discussing has been under discussion for hundreds and thousands of years. I just happen to recall the edict of one of the kings in Spain embodied in one of the first-written codifications of law ever known to civilization, published in 1238. That edict was issued in Spain to this effect:

"Whereas it nas come to our knowledge that some of the merchants of our realm have been in the habit of monopolizing trade in articles of manufacture and fixing prices at which they would sell products and goods and necessities; and

"Whereas it has also come to our knowledge that certain of the members of the guilds of Spain, the workingmen's organizations, have been in the habit of forming combinations and fixing the number of apprentices to be taught their trades; and

"Whereas such acts are contrary to the welfare of the realm in general, they are prohibited under the penalties of the law."

The Senator, of course, realizes the fact that the same character of legislation was enacted in England in the year 1200. We are all poor humans, and I am as anxious as the Senator is, and doubtless as every other Member of the Senate, to do what is right and what is just. I want light, and for that reason I was asking the Senator just what his idea is that Congress can do to remedy the existing conditions.

Mr. OWEN. A good many things can be done to remedy conditions. The main thing, I think, is the one which I first suggested, and among other things, to stimulate production in this country, to simplify methods of distribution and provide by charter a method for the most economical distribution of products in this country, I have worked out such a bill, as a marketing bill, submitted at this session of Congress, just such a measure as was introduced by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] a few days ago, providing for cooperative societies in the District of Columbia. I think that system might well be extended elsewhere.

One of the things which has contributed a good deal to expensive living in this country has been the extraordinary inflation of gold coming into this country in exchange for commodities. We had eleven hundred million dollars of gold coming to this country during the war, which added about 30 per cent to our normal circulation. I think we can stabilize the amount of currency which we permit to circulate in the United States and place it at a fixed figure and keep it there.

I think that is one of the things that might be done, but the main thing, the real thing, is to put the hand of the Government upon the wholesale profiteers who prevent production, who arbitrarily fix prices, who, because of the enormous excess profit which they make, set standards of extravagance which are injurious in the highest degree. One can not go into a New York hotel without paying $10 or $15 for a room, and it is because there is such a large number of people who are beneficiaries of this system that they set a false standard, and that false standard, in my judgment, is due directly to the profiteering system and to the monopoly system, so that the whole world points to America as a land of trusts.

The Government should go out of partnership with excess profits, repeal the tax on excess profits, because such tax is added directly on the product and crushes the consumer.

We ought to spread the cost of the war over 50 years, as a means of helping to reduce the costs on goods, for these taxes are passed with accumulated profits on to the prices that fall on the consumer.

Mr. FALL. We undertook to reach the trusts by legislation, and the legislation has only been invoked in the last month or two by the Attorney General. The former Attorney General apparently did not undertake to do it.

Mr. OWEN. We ought to systematically stop the waste of Government activities by a carefully planned budget system, for these expenditures fall on the people. We ought to pass the German and Austrian peace treaties, so that the world may know how to extend credits and get production at home and abroad back to a normal and improved basis.

We ought to extend credits freely to Europe to cover their purchases of raw material and machinery, and thus speed up the production of Europe. Congress has not yet provided an adequate means to this end, although for one I have drawn bills and prayed action on them that would afford the remedy.

The people of this country carried on an earnest campaign trying to correct the abuse of private monopolies before it had assumed very great relative proportions, and 30 years ago passed the Sherman antitrust law. The Sherman antitrust law is to-day little less than an open mockery.

Mr. FALL. The Senator assisted in amending the Sherman antitrust law three or four years ago.

Mr. OWEN. Not very efficiently; but it did at least declare that human labor should not be held "a commodity."

Mr. FALL. That may be. Nevertheless Congress acted, and it acted after three or four or five months of discussion, and the Senator voted for the bill which was passed.

Mr. OWEN. Congress ought to find a way to settle this matter, and ought not to be satisfied with the mere passage of bills which are inefficient and have proven to be so. I pray for progressive action that shall give an adequate remedy for the high cost of living.

Mr. FALL. Unfortunately, poor human judgment errs yet.

Mr. OWEN. I am glad the Senator feels that it is the weakness of human judgment.

Mr. FALL. I do think so.

Mr. OWEN. I think it is more largely the undue influence of those who have great power.

Mr. FALL. The Senator himself was one of the strongest advocates of the Clayton Act which was passed here.

Mr. OWEN. I thought it would help, but it has not helped very much. I was not on the committee and was not well satisfied with it.

Mr. FALL. The Senator was one of the sponsors for the pure-food act which is now on the statute books.

Mr. OWEN. We have made some advances in the last three or four years, learning how things may be done, and I think I have seen something that will help to solve it, and I have made several very practical suggestions to the Senator and to the Senate, which is about all I can do as a member of the minority. I will gladly cooperate with the minority to help this, and I appeal to the more progressive Senators of the majority to act.

Mr. FALL. I am asking yet what it is. Generally, I understand, the Senator objects to the distribution system. I agree with him. How can it be remedied?

Mr. OWEN. What I suggested was that there should be set up an administrative power with authority to pass upon the question of whether or not the prices charged by the interstate monopolies were reasonable or unreasonable, and to require them under license to treat the public reasonably.

Mr. FALL. The trouble with that suggestion is that six years ago it was made by one of the candidates for the Presidency of the United States and was repudiated by the gentleman who was elected, and the passage of the Federal Trade Commission act was insisted upon with the teeth cut out of it by the present administration.

Mr. OWEN. I am in favor of putting very substantial teeth in it.

Mr. FALL. So was Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. OWEN. Then I am with Theodore Roosevelt on that, as I have been in a good many other things, especially in his demand for popular government, the initiative and referendum and the recall.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD the item with regard to the attitude of the Vatican. I think it is a very important step and one that will be of great value to the world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

VATICAN WILL AID LIBERALS OF THE WORLD—PAPAL LETTER ANNOUNCES RELATIONS WITH DEMOCRACIES—FOUR PLANKS OF ITS SOCIAL PROGRAM GIVEN—FIGHT ON BOLSHEVISM AND EDUCATION OF PROLETARIAT INCLUDED.

PARIS, September 8.

Politically the Vatican has joined hands with democracies and cast its lot with the new world-wide liberal movement, it was brought out in a Papal letter addressed to Cardinal Lucon and made public to-day in connection with participation of French Catholics in the coming parliamentary elections.

The Vatican will hereafter accept democracy as the only source of political power and will work to build up and establish democratic government.

ANNOUNCES FOUR PLANS.

The Vatican program contains four definite planks for the establishment of social peace. They comprise:

Cooperation of all classes.
Coalition of all classes against Bolshevism.
Acceptance of democracy.
Education of the proletariat.

NO PREVIOUS DEMOCRATIC RELATIONS.

Immediately preceding the war decline of monarchies and growth of democracies had left the Vatican with but the Hapsburg and Spanish monarchies for political allegiance. No diplomatic relations were maintained with Europe's democracies.

The fall of the Hapsburg dynasty left but one Catholic monarchy, and the Pope faced the necessity of recognizing democracies or practically disappearing from the diplomatic world. Pope Benedict has frankly announced his choice of the former.

SITUATION IN FRANCE AND ITALY.

One almost certain result of this policy will be eventual resumption of political and diplomatic relations with France and Italy, thus gaining support in the two leading Catholic countries of Europe, a move which will make up for the loss of influence in Austria-Hungary. The movement for reconciliation with political government is already well advanced in Italy.

In his letter to Cardinal Lucon the Pope said, in part:

"The great outstanding fact in the world to-day is the ever-strengthening current everywhere toward democracy. The proletariat classes, as they are called, having taken the preponderant part in the war, desire in every country to derive therefrom the maximum advantage.

"Unfortunately, this is often pushed to excess. They would overturn the social order, which human nature renders necessary to the detriment of everybody.

"The Catholic Church has always loved those who suffer and has always taught that public powers established for the common good must work especially to improve conditions of those who suffer.

"That is why the Catholic clergy must not oppose the proletarian revindications, but must favor them, providing they remain within the limits of honesty and justice."

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 25, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 24, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, out of the substance of whose Being sprang forth in love, the vast and stupendous universe and all that dwells therein, we thank Thee for the beautiful world, full of all the necessities and joys of life, in which Thou hast placed us as sojourners—a veritable school out of which we may develop all that is purest and best in us.

Teach us how to live together in brotherly love, that discords, contentions, selfish ambitions and foolish desires may vanish and peace dwell among us now and always. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLICATION OF THE CHAPLAIN'S PRAYERS.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit an inquiry which may or may not be a parliamentary inquiry. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that several years ago at my suggestion the then Speaker of the House, Mr. CLARK, ordered the Chaplain's prayers to be printed for each Congress in book form. I desire to know whether or not that is a continuing order, and, if not, if the present Speaker looks with favor on it?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair remembers, that was not done by the Speaker but was done by order of the Congress.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I think the Speaker's information is not correct. I called it to the attention of the Speaker, and he ordered the printing of the prayers in book form, without any further action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no authority permitting it to be done in that way. It must be done by resolution.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Then, in the opinion of the Speaker, it is necessary to have such a resolution?

The SPEAKER. Yes. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roll of committees.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY—REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. ESCH (when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I call up the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control," and so forth. It is on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce calls up the bill S. 641. This is on the Union Calendar, and the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 641, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 641, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, there is a widespread interest in the pending legislation. Petitions, telegrams, and letters have come to the committee and to individual Members of the House from all parts of the country asking that this legislation be enacted. The large business institutions of the country, manufacturing concerns, chambers of commerce, traffic boards, and individual shippers ask that there shall be restored to the Interstate Commerce Commission the powers over rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices which the commission had and which they exercised prior to Federal control.

The committee gave extensive hearings to those interested in the legislation, for and against. Among those appearing before the committee were representatives of the State railroad commissions, and an argument was presented in behalf of this legislation by Mr. Charles E. Elmquist, who is the local representative of the State commissions. So that in the presentation we have the assurance that the various State commissions indorse this legislation. But aside from Mr. Elmquist's individual presentation, there were sent to the committee the views of some of the individual State commissions and some of the individual commissioners.

It may be asked why this legislation is sought at this time, in view of the probable action on the part of Congress in restoring the roads to private ownership and operation. In my opinion there is greater need of this legislation now than at any time in the past. The nearer the end of Federal control approaches the greater is the possibility and probability of further increases in the rate levels. We had a general increase of rate levels under order 25, effective the 25th of June, 1918. The increase affected both freight and passenger rates. It caused widespread confusion throughout the country. It largely increased the burden of transportation, the cost of production, and cost to consumers. Any flat increase of the level of rates inevitably results in destroying the relationship of rates. And unless these are maintained at various basic points, confusion results. Uncertainty in business is an inevitable consequence. And for months after this order was issued it was necessary for the officials of the Railroad Administration to send their traffic men to make necessary readjustments.

Is there fear or is there prospect of another increase in the level of rates before Federal control shall cease? I can not speak with authority. I can only state the situation as it exists at the present moment and leave you to your own deductions. For every month of Federal control the earnings of the carriers were less than the standard return guaranteed to the roads under the Federal control act, except in the month of July, the last month for which we have statistics. The roads up to the 1st of July had fallen practically $500,000,000 below the standard return guaranteed by the Government. But in the month of July there was an excess of about $2,000,000. The results of operation for August are not yet available, but it is reasonable to presume that August will also show a surplus, and this month of September might show a surplus unless the strike conditions in the steel industry cause a deficit.

It is the strike situation now pending that causes concern as to the earnings of the roads for the month of September, and, if the strike conditions continue, for succeeding months. We all know that the steel industry, with its allied industries, is one of the fundamental industries of the Nation. It produces a tremendous amount of tonnage, and many other industries are dependent thereon. If this great industry is hampered and its output is materially lessened, and the output of all industries dependent thereon is greatly lessened, you can understand what effect that would have upon the freight earnings of the roads. I therefore fear that the strike situation, if long continued, will result in a very marked reduction in the freight earnings of the roads, and by so much will create a deficit in the earnings below the standard return, which must be paid out of the Federal Treasury.

But this is not the only situation that causes us to fear that we will not continue to earn the standard return. This other situation arises on account of the demand made by the various railroad employees' organizations for still further increases of pay. The shopmen have already laid before the Director General their demands, and the locomotive engineers have already presented their demands, and other labor organizations among railroad employees will in the near future, perhaps, present their demands for increases of wages.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. I would prefer to go on, but I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I notice in the morning papers that the president of the American Federation of Labor states emphatically that if Congress passes what is known as the Cummins return railroad bill his Federation will pay no attention whatever to it, but will disregard it and disobey the law. What I wanted to ask the chairman was this: Have we Mr. Gompers's permission to pass this bill? Have we his permission to pass it before we waste our time in making it a law?

Mr. ESCH. We have not heard Mr. Gompers or any representative of railroad brotherhoods on this bill. They sought no hearing.

I would state that these increased demands for pay by these various railroad employees' organizations, if granted, will still further tend to lessen the net operating income and increase the possibilities of deficits payable out of the Federal Treasury. I understand, from newspaper accounts only, however, that the Director General has agreed tentatively to increases in the pay of the shopmen, ranging from 4 cents to 20 cents an hour. There are some 600,000 of them.

If an increase of only 4 cents an hour is granted, it would involve, as I am informed, a total additional cost of operation of $45,000,000 per annum, and when one demand is allowed the inevitable tendency is for other organizations to put in demands, and the cumulative effect of the granting of these demands will be an increased deficit. So I again call attention to the fact that in view of this situation we can not hope that the surplus in July will be repeated or increased in succeeding months if these conditions continue and these demands are granted.

What is the inevitable conclusion? This and this only: The demand on the part of the Director General for an increase of rates may be from 15 to 25 per cent. The increase of 25 per cent in June of last year involved an additional burden upon the shippers of the United States of almost $1,000,000,000. So this situation presents itself, that there is prospect and probability of a further increase in the rate levels. What this bill does in such an emergency is to give to some regulatory body the power of passing upon the justness and reasonableness of such an increase of the rate level, a body which by reason of its experience and its equipment and its service can promptly and with due regard to conflicting interests and to rival territory make a wise adjustment of the rates.

We believe that this bill provides that relief in restoring to the commission the power to suspend the increase ordered by the President through the Director General until it shall have had the time to consider the effect of rate levels and the justness of such increase. It is a large problem. It involves the whole Nation, and for that reason we believe the legislation proposed should be enacted.

One of the powers—the great power exercised to-day under the Federal control act by the President, through the Director General—is the power of initiating rates, fares, charges, rules, practices, and regulations. He has that enormous power, granted him under the Federal control act. This bill does not take that power from him. He is still given the power to initiate both interstate and intrastate rates. Therefore we do not here change the policy. The President still has the power, through the initiation of rates, of determining the policy. But under this bill, while the President still retains the power of initiating these rates, fares, charges, and so forth, he has not the power of putting them into effect without notice or with such notice as he sees fit to give. Under this bill, when he initiates the rate, notice thereof must be given, as was required under the original interstate act before Federal control began, and the schedules had to be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission 30 days ahead of their becoming effective. Under this bill we restore the normal operation of the interstate-commerce act with reference to passing upon rates, fares, and charges. We restore the power of the commission to suspend an increase in the level of rates or to increase specific rates until the commission shall have opportunity to review such increase and make the necessary and proper adjustments in the interest of the great shipping public, which in the end pays the freight.

Under this bill, as I say, we do not take away from the President the power of initiation of rates. All we ask is that when the President has initiated the rates the notice thereof shall be properly filed, the schedules shall be properly filed, and the commission shall have the right to suspend those rates pending a consideration of their justness and their reasonableness.

Is there anything wrong about that? Why, gentlemen, think of the power we have granted under the Federal control act, of giving to one man the right of increasing overnight the level of rates affecting 110,000,000 people—a tremendous power; and we only granted it through the exercise of a war power. But now that the war is ended and peace conditions are restored, the people feel that we should get back to normal and get back to the Constitution.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Why do you vest this power to initiate rates in the President instead of the Director General?

Mr. ESCH. The Director General is not recognized in the Federal control act at all. You will not find that office mentioned in the Federal control act, and we did not want to recognize it in this bill because by so doing we would make it a statutory office. We, therefore, put the power in the hands of the President, where it was placed by the original Federal control act. This one-man power granted under the Federal control act gave to one man the power of setting aside both acts of Congress and acts of State legislatures, of setting aside the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission, of State commissions; yes, and of the courts themselves.

Do we want to continue a supreme arbitrary power like that, now that the armistice has been signed 9 or 10 months ago? Public opinion as represented in petitions, resolutions, memorials, telegrams, and letters coming to us indicates that the public is desirous of getting back again to the same control, under the operation of the same laws, that existed prior to Federal control.

As illustrative of the power we placed in the hands of the Director General—and I do not stand here to criticize him, for I pay my tribute to his distinguished ability—I wish to state that in issuing order No. 27 with reference to wastage in grain cars he practically changed the common law by putting upon the shipper of grain the burden of proving negligence on the part of the carrier even after his grain had been delivered in the car. It took months of appeals from the grain shippers of the United States, thousands of telegrams directed to the Director General here in Washington, and a visit from interested shippers to the department before that order was modified. This is but one illustration. Another is an order issued that the owner of an industrial plant who wished to put an industrial spur between his plant and the main line had to pay for that industrial spur, and even was required to pay the cost of laying the rails from the point of clearance to the switch point, although that portion of the industrial track was wholly on the railroad property, and the owner of the industrial plant was repaid that cost by a charge of $2 per car. The owner of that industrial plant was also required to keep that part of the switch between the clearance point and the switch point free from snow and ice during the winter months. These are but illustrative of the power exercised by the Director General under the Federal control law which we have enacted. The shipping interests of the Nation want a day in court.

How are rates now determined? They are practically determined by so-called district traffic committees located in the various business and traffic centers of the United States. When Federal control began these district committees consisted of two representatives of the railroads and one representative of the shipping interests.

When this was brought to the attention of the country and pressure was brought to bear, the district traffic committees were increased in size, so that three representatives of the railroads and two representatives of the larger shippers or traffic associations of the district were put on the committees. There was, therefore, at the very start a railroad atmosphere in the district traffic committees of the United States. I do not complain, but it is only natural for the three representatives of the railroads, in the matter of adjusting the rates, to take that view of the situation which would inure to the advantage of the carriers. These district traffic committees are composed of honest and efficient men, but they hold only informal hearings when a shipper makes complaint. There is really no record kept. There are no hearings, as stated by the Supreme Court in certain decisions interpreting the interstate-commerce act. There are no real hearings, and if the shipper does not get a favorable ruling from the district traffic committee he has a right to appeal to another committee, and then that committee forwards its report to the Railroad Administration here in Washington. The trouble is the shipping interests do not believe that they have their day in court. They have not an opportunity of presenting their side of the situation, as they know they would have had before Federal control began. Therefore what they are asking to-day is a day in court, and this bill, if enacted, would give it to them.

I do not wish to consume all the time. I now come to the changes which this bill makes in existing law. It only seeks to amend section 10 of the Federal control act. That is the section which gives the President the power of initiating rates, fares, charges, and so forth, and also gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon complaint, the right to review any rate initiated by the President, but it is required to keep in view the fact that the railroads are under a unified system of control and that there is no longer competition between them. It was also provided that the President could issue a certificate in case he increased the level of rates, to be filed with the commission, to the effect that in his opinion the increased cost of operation, due to whatever cause, made it necessary for the railroads to increase their revenue, and when such certificate was filed by the President, the commission, in passing upon such rates on complaint, was required to take the certificate of the President into consideration. That is all proper enough in time of war emergency. This bill leaves the power of initiation in the President, as I have stated, as to both interstate and intrastate rates, but restores to the commission all the powers it had as to review and suspension of rates which it had exercised prior to the commencement of Federal control with this exception: By an amendment passed in August, 1917, to the interstate commerce act the Interstate Commerce Commission must first agree to any increase of rates before they could be filed. We, in this bill, do not believe that that limitation should be applicable to the President of the United States, he still retaining the power to initiate the rates, and so we put in a provision excepting that amendment of August 9, 1917, so as not to require the President to ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to agree in advance to the increased rates before the same could be filed.

This amended section 10 also contains two provisions with reference to the collection of judgments. In the early months of Federal control there was much complaint about delays in securing the payment of judgments, and there is still cause for complaint. So we put in the provisions which you will find about the middle of page 2, where we say that—

The final judgments based on claims accruing prior to the Government control shall be paid by the President out of such compensation as is or has been agreed to be paid to such carrier except as otherwise provided in the form of standard contract dated April 5, 1919.

We believe that these provisions will allay any further anxiety as to the payment of judgments secured prior to Federal control or during the period of Federal control. I will say in justice to the Director General that he was very anxious to see that all such claims were promptly paid, and said he would aid the creditor or the plaintiff in finding property that was still subject to execution in order to satisfy judgments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I noticed in the paper several days ago that shippers living 200 miles this side of the Pacific coast desiring to ship goods east, to New York or other points, must first ship their goods to San Francisco and afterwards bring them back several hundred miles over the same route in shipping them to those eastern points. Can the gentleman explain that situation?

Mr. ESCH. That relates more properly to legislation which we will bring in later, but is not involved in this legislation.

Now, I want to call your attention to the proviso in the middle of page 4 in reference to the status of intrastate rates. I have already said that the President retains the power to initiate intrastate rates, and we say, in line 9:

Provided, That no change or increase shall hereafter be made in intrastate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices without having first secured the approval of the proper State regulating tribunals conformable to the laws of the several States.

In other words, the President shall file with the State commission the notices of increases or changes in intrastate rates, fares, and charges, and so on, and these shall be passed upon by the proper State regulatory authorities.

The last paragraph of the bill should properly be designated as section 2. It makes a change in the statute of limitations for claims for reparation, and also claims for damage and loss of property, and excludes from the two years' period now allowed within which to file such claims the period of Federal control. The committee felt convinced that the shippers should be entitled to this favor, because of the fact that during Federal control many of the traffic experts of the railroads left the service and entered the military branch, entailing more or less delay because their tariff departments were undermanned. Then there was preference given to shipments of war supplies, and general commercial business was more or less neglected or ignored, so that many shippers, after the two years in which they could file claims had elapsed, upon presenting their claims, were refused by the carriers, who invoked the statute of limitations and resisted payment.

These, gentlemen, are a few of the salient features of the pending measure, and I hope that when you consider the same you will agree that it is wise and salutary legislation, and ought to be speedily enacted. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I am opposed to the bill, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to have an opportunity to state why I oppose the bill. If the House will give this bill calm and full consideration, which I have no doubt it will, I do not believe there will be 20 votes for it without proper amendments. Yet there is no minority report, and why? Because it will be so plain and easily determined what the amendments should be that we do not need any minority report.

This is a bill giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to suspend rates that are initiated by the President. Why do we want the President to initiate rates if he has no power to put them in force. It is one of the most highly expert services that a railroad official can perform—initiating a rate schedule. It requires knowledge of the effect the rates will have on the traffic and upon the country, upon the shipper, upon the consumer, and upon everybody.

A bill was passed for taking the railroads over and operating them during the war and 21 months thereafter, exclusively for war purposes. I mean that that was the only reason given for taking them over. All the ordinary rules and regulations and procedure gave way to the war purpose. In order that the war purpose might be carried out, the President was empowered to initiate rates and to put them into full operation and effect. That power was given to the President of the United States through such agency as he might appoint for that purpose.

But the law did provide that upon complaint rates made and put into effect upon hearing and consideration, the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the power to modify or suspend the rate.

Now, only one rate increase has taken place by the President or the Director General. It was an increase of 25 per cent. A howl went up all over the country about this increase. Complaints came from everywhere, and what do we now hear from the railroads themselves, the owners, those who will have charge and responsibility for the service as soon as they are returned? They say that the increase was not sufficient and that a further increase is absolutely necessary to keep them from going into bankruptcy on the return of the railroads.

Why bring in a bill so illogical as to require the President of the United States, through such agencies as he may appoint, to initiate rates? Why provide that he is to bring in a schedule saying what rates shall be on corn, tobacco, wheat, iron, steel, all over the United States, something that it will take weeks and months to make, and then provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission, either with or without complaint, may suspend the rates and prevent them going into effect until a hearing has been had by the Interstate Commerce Commission? Pray tell me how long it would take the commission to have a just, fair, illuminating hearing on rates all over the United States? Whenever the President initiates a rate it applies to the whole United States, not to a particular section or district. I do not care if the rates be increased only 5 per cent, it will be challenged by every interest in the United States that is affected by it, and the pressure would be so great upon the Interstate Commerce Commission that they would not dare refuse to suspend it and give a hearing upon it. They never have in the past, and they never will be in the future. Think about what an embarrassment you place on the Interstate Commerce Commission. Congress has said in its wisdom, according to this bill, that the President is better prepared to initiate the rate schedule than the railroads themselves, and therefore in the public interest it requires the President to initiate the rate schedules, having said to the Interstate Commerce Commission that he is more expert than the rate-making officials of the railroads, who have been making them for years, but that the Interstate Commerce Commission may suspend and not let the rates go into effect until a hearing has been had and the commission is satisfied that the rates ought to go in. You impose the responsibility of preparing a schedule and suggesting the proper rates, and then you do not even give it a prima facie standing until after the commission has had a hearing and has had opportunity to know whether or not it ought to go in.

If this bill is going to take all of the power from the Government, through the President, to initiate and put in rates and protect the taxpayers where possible against further deficits and hold the taxpayer responsible for what it lacks, it will then reduce the President to the pitiful function of merely suggesting something for the Interstate Commerce Commission to immediately suspend. Look at other rate suspensions where they covered only a particular section. Take the 5 per cent rate increase and the 15 per cent increase for the territory lying east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio and the Potomac Rivers. Months were consumed in hearings, where the increase asked was only 5 per cent. Take the whole United States, and how long would it take the commission to act? It would take months. Therefore the Interstate Commerce Commission would hesitate to suspend the rates, knowing what a hearing would mean and how long the hearing would take, knowing that every day the rates remained in suspension the deficit would get larger for the taxpayer to pay. Why not have the courage, if you pass this bill, to amend it and not give the President the initiating power only. Let the railroads initiate the rates just as they did when they had full control, and then let the commission, if it thinks proper, suspend the rate and have hearings. The railroads know better what rates they need. Each system knows better what rates will take care of its situation better than the President can know or the Director General. Yet you say here that you will not trust the traffic officials of the Pennsylvania to say what is necessary for them to have. You call on the Director General to make a rate for them. Then the shipper who is interested says the rate ought to be suspended because it is too high, and then the Pennsylvania officials say that the rate ought not to be suspended because it is too low. We go on with that kind of an affair while Uncle Sam holds the bag and is responsible for the results of a rate that he could not put in and enforce for one hour.

I am surprised that a great committee of this House should report this bill without further amendment. Amend it so as to return the rate-initiating power to the railroads, where it belongs, and give the power of suspension to the commission. Then the logical thing would be, where the railroads made a deficit, in so far as a particular railroad is concerned, that the responsibility should cease the moment the rates become effective as to the Government. Let us save the taxpayer; give him a showing for his white ally. Look at present conditions. I do not know whether or not there is in contemplation any further increase of rates, but I know that our committee has heard testimony for more than two months, beginning on the 15th day of July, sitting forenoons and afternoons all of the time, and some of the ablest railroad officials in the country have appeared and said to us that without a further increase in rates and without the constinuance of the standard return, if the roads are returned, it would mean bankruptcy and receiverships inevitably. If you are going to make Uncle Sam, the people of the United States, pay and be responsible for what the railroads fail to make of this standard return, then let the Government, through the agencies it now has, continue to initiate the rates and let them go in and remain in force until modified or set aside by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There is another inconsistency in this bill. We are not returning to prewar conditions. If we did, the initiation of rates would be returned to the railroads and the Interstate Commerce Commission would not have the power to suspend the rates applicable wholly within a State, intrastate rates. This bill provides that we shall keep the war power for three purposes—one is to initiate rates, the other is to be responsible for the deficit to make up the standard return, and the third is that you may without warrant of law or otherwise control intrastate rates and take that power away from the State commissions. What an inconsistent bill this will be to pass it without amendment.

There is but one way to amend it, and that is to amend it the right way. Take the whole machinery out of the hands of the Government, turn it back to the owners, turn it over to those who are responsible for making rates, who know better how to make them than anybody else, turn them over to the revision of those rate-making bodies who have served a lifetime making rates, and let the Interstate Commerce Commission suspend the interstate rates if it deems they ought to be suspended, or let them put in the increase and let the intrastate rates be passed on by the State authorities under the State laws. Let us not make the taxpayer responsible for any deficit that may exist after the passage of this bill growing out of a rate that has been initiated by the roads and not suspended by the commission. The President does not assume to be qualified to initiate rates, and no one can be qualified to initiate rates covering the whole of the United States as well as the rate-making officials. This bill is a Pandora's box.

Pass this bill if you will and be responsible for the results which will follow. I have no amendments to suggest to the different sections and as to what they propose to accomplish if we are going to return the roads in this way, but there are amendments that ought to be made—at least two of them. One is that rates shall be initiated by the railroads. In other words, repeal the act as far as rate initiating is concerned and permit both State and Federal commissions to act within their respective jurisdictions in proper cases, and then if there is a deficit due to rates made by the State commissions or approved by them and by the Interstate Commerce Commission with the railroads initiating the rates, we have nobody to blame except those who are best qualified to pass judgment on conditions; that is, the railroads as to initiating rates, and the State commissions as to intrastate rates, and the Interstate Commerce Commission as to interstate rates. Let us not make a pretense of this thing. Let us repeal the law, but not as to liabilities already incurred or anything of that sort, but as to rate initiating and rate making and the operation of the roads.

Nobody thinks more of the Interstate Commerce Commission, both as to its members and their ability, than I do, but I do think this will be a mistake if this bill is passed just as it has been reported. I do not know whether these financial men in New York and other places—investment bankers—are correct or not, or whether they may not be mistaken. But they say that laws radical and revolutionary must be enacted by Congress before the roads are returned to private ownership or that issues of railway securities will not find a market anywhere in the world. The railway executives claim that we must have a rate-making provision by Congress that will enable the roads to pay operating expenses, including wages, salaries, proper maintenance, and replacements, and enough over and above that to guarantee 6 per cent return upon the property investment of the roads or there will be no demand for railroad securities. It was claimed back in 1906 by Mr. James J. Hill that the country needed from that time on for 10 or 15 years at least $1,000,000,000 in new railway construction every year—that much new money. That has been 12 or 13 years ago. That billion dollars per annum was not forthcoming in the meantime. Now, there has been no new construction since the war period except such as the Government ordered and put in as a war necessity. The demands for railway construction after this war is finally over and peace is made for the next 10 years with the present high cost of labor and supplies, instead of being $1,000,000,000 a year, it will require $2,000,000,000 a year for the same amount of improvements. An engine now costing forty or fifty thousand dollars will not perform the service that two engines did 10 or 12 years ago that cost no more than one does now; so equipment will call for more money than it ever did. We must take into consideration renewals, repairs, wages, and salaries, and not shut our eyes and blindly return the roads with no power to meet new conditions. The body that has got the right to suspend a rate is the real rate-making authority. The commissioners are good men, but you know what pressure means. Members of Congress know how great pressure is brought, which is legitimate touching legislation, and how hard it is to resist it.

When the commission hears the storm of protest from morning until night and when their mail is loaded down with letters claiming that the initiated rates that have been made by the Government will put them out of business, it will be almost impossible to refuse a suspension. With such a prima facie case as will be shown on the side of the shippers, the commission will be almost superhuman not to suspend the proposed rates under such pressure of public demand. When once suspended nobody knows when the matter will be finally disposed of. Now, let us act boldly, but cautiously and effectively. If we continue Federal control of the railroads, that will hold the Government liable for the standard return and require us to maintain and keep the railroads in efficient condition to serve the country. Now, do not make it practically impossible for the Government to do it. It will be possible to suspend every rate unless it is a rate made by the President, even an intrastate rate. Therefore, unless somebody else does it, I feel constrained to offer two amendments. One is to take away from the President, if this bill passes, any responsibility for the initiation of rates that is left in him by the bill as reported. Restore to the commissions, State and National, the full authority they had before the war came on with reference to rates over which they respectively have jurisdiction, and let the railroad authorities, the most competent you can possibly get, initiate such rates as they think they will have to have, and let them be suspended if the commission thinks they ought to be suspended.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the railroads do not have charge of the properties themselves and will not until they are released. If the gentleman takes from the President the authority to initiate rates, the railroad companies would have no authority to initiate rates because we have not returned the properties. Now, who would initiate the rates?

Mr. SIMS. Restore that power to them. Did not I say that?

Mr. DENISON. No; the gentleman did not.

Mr. SIMS. Well, I meant to say restore the power to initiate rates, and when we do do it and the commission passes on it then all further liability of the Government for the standard return as to the road shall cease.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the gentleman means to offer an amendment immediately to repeal the Federal control act?

Mr. SIMS. No; it would not be to immediately repeal it.

Mr. DENISON. That would be the substance of it.

Mr. SIMS. No; not necessarily, because the railroads may make rates that will not be suspended. They may go into effect.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion of this bill. I want to know if in your judgment you think it wise to discontinue Government control at this time and immediately?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think it wise to do it, but I think if we are going to do it you should do it completely and wholly and not by piecemeal. We have a divided responsibility in this bill. What is the use, what is the practical reason, for the Government to initiate rates and not have the power to put them into operation? There is no good common business sense in doing such a thing. Of course, if the railroads begin to operate their own property now, and the standard returns should remain in effect, they could be as inefficient as they might want to be. But I believe they would endeavor to be efficient. But knowing they would have the entire responsibility for the successful running of the roads, my opinion is that they would do everything they could to cut down expenses and increase revenue. That would be natural. But I think that it would be a mistake at this time to repeal the law absolutely, all of it, right away, and stop payment of the standard return. There exists a great state of uncertainty and unrest, and nobody knows what will happen.

Now, the war purpose was a national purpose; the war use was one that appealed to everybody's patriotism, and if operated during the war as an adjunct to the winning of the war, and at a deficit, let the people pay it as they do everything else in the way of war expenditure and be done with it. But this deficit ought not to continue any longer than it is possible to prevent it. But if we simply create a power of suspension in the Interstate Commerce Commission, I should feel, if I was President, that I would not initiate rates at all. What would be the use? He can not put them in force. Restore to the railroads the power to initiate rates and restore to the commission the power to pass on them, just as they did before the war; then, when the rates have been initiated by the railroads and put in force, let the Government liability cease. The railroads are interested in making all they can; we are interested in saving to the people all we can.

I took that position when we passed the original Federal control law. When we passed it I was not in favor of putting any limitation on the time of Government control, and gave as my reason that conditions would exist after the war that we could not foresee, and that Congress would still have the power to act, and that we ought to assume that future Congresses would know better what to do than that Congress could possibly foresee. I do not believe it would be wise at this time to repeal this law absolutely; certainly with no time for the railroads to prepare themselves for corporate action.

Mr. SWEET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. SWEET. Is the gentleman in favor of the bill he introduced on May 19, 1919, whereby "the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall be continued for and during the period of the war and thereafter until January 1, 1924"?

Mr. SIMS. I will state to the gentleman that that bill was introduced in the Sixty-fifth Congress. As you all remember, Secretary McAdoo made a suggestion——

Mr. SWEET. I will say that it was also introduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress.

Mr. SIMS. I am going to explain if the gentleman will give me an opportunity.

When it was introduced it was to continue control to 1924. In this Congress it was reintroduced without change. I will vote for the bill and advocate it, with amendments making the operation during Federal control conform to peace-time commercial purposes and provide for such additional powers to be restored to the Interstate Commerce Commission as will aid in securing the best peace-time service for a period at least during the 21 months following the peace proclamation, if we are ever to have any, during which time the present disturbed conditions will subside and a normal condition in business and transportation will return. And when it does return we can legislate with a great deal more certainty and safety and wisdom than we can now. The gentleman from Iowa heard Mr. Clifford Thorne in his statement to our committee yesterday, did he not?

Mr. SWEET. I did.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman remember what he suggested in his closing remarks? The substance was, as I recall it, that he and almost everybody else was in favor of the immediate return of the railroads after the armistice, that he so expressed himself when he appeared in favor of this bill. And yet, as I understood him yesterday, he now thinks it would be unwise to do so and that we had best let the 21 months run with Government liability in order that times might become normal, and then legislate with reference to conditions yet to arise, instead of guessing at them, as we must do now.

Many men are changing their opinions about this matter; they are changing them very rapidly. A state of unrest is present in every kind of industry, not alone in the railroad industry but in everything. Railroad men, those responsible, do not want these properties back without some guaranty that conditions that have arisen out of the war shall be taken care of by the whole country. We have been working for two and one-half months to try to report a bill amending and improving the existing law—the prewar existing law. And there were about as many plans presented as there were gentlemen who appeared before us, and we are not to-day ready to make a report as to what should be done.

Why do this job by piecemeal? Why pass this bill and then pass another that will supersede the effect, possibly, of this bill? We are going too fast. But if we are going to do anything let us not do just a part of it. If this bill is to pass, let us take the initiation of rates away from the President and return it to the railroads and restore the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend such rates, and restore the power to the State commissions to function just as they did before the war. Let us stop the Government liability not immediately; but as soon as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State commissions have acted on whatever is presented by the railroads in the way of increases or decreases in rates, and then stop the liability of the taxpayer to make good the mistakes of the railroads or the commissions in regard to rates and operations of the carriers. I do not know how we can pursue a wiser course.

I have no objection to this bill, provided we do not continue the rate initiating power in the President, but with no power to put such rates in force. I do not think this bill, just as it is, ought to pass.

Mr. Chairman, I retain the rest of my time. How much time did I use?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman in a moment.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to read to the House a few excerpts from our morning paper.

Mr. KING. What papers is the gentleman going to read from?

Mr. BLANTON. I will first read from the Washington Post of yesterday:

MOB SEIZES TOWN; DRIVE OUT POLICE—THREE GIRLS WHO REFUSE TO STRIKE HELD PRISONERS WITHOUT FOOD.

DRUMRIGHT, OKLA., September 22.

Drumright to-night is in the hands of a mob, which, having disarmed the chief and members of the police department and driven the latter from town while threatening the former with death unless he resigned, has warned the Bell Telephone Co. that if demands of the striking telephone girls are not granted its plant will be burned.

Three young women operators who refused to strike are reported to be held prisoners by the mob in the telephone building, where their friends are refused admittance or the right to supply them with food.

Yesterday's papers and to-day's papers reiterate the fact that in the strikes which are going on throughout our Nation to-day not only are the lives of human beings taken but numerous citizens—men, women, and children—are injured, some of them seriously injured.

Mr. Chairman and colleagues, our Constitution and that flag guarantee to every person in this Union protection in his life and in his liberty, in his right to work when and where he pleases under the laws of this land——

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the distinguished gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not. I have just 10 minutes, and I desire to say something that should be of vital importance to the House of Representatives. In his right to acquire and hold property, if you please, one of the most sacred rights that is given to a citizen under the Constitution of the land; in his right to follow the pursuit of happiness, with proper limitations and restrictions, if you please. These are the sacred rights guaranteed by the Constitution. Every man has a right to quit work when he wants to. Any combination of men have the right to quit work when they want to. But under the Constitution of the land and under the principles guaranteed by that flag the men or the combination of men who desire to quit work themselves, while having that right, have no right whatever under the law to interfere with the inalienable God-given right of every other citizen to work for his daily bread in this land if to work is his desire. Yet by force and threats men and women are now prevented from doing honest work, with laws of God and country disregarded.

I want to say that it is a disgrace to this Nation and it is a disgrace to the flag we love for three innocent working girls of Oklahoma to be taken captive, if you please, and to be locked up in a building by strikers because, forsooth, they wanted to work and not strike; and when they are denied access to their friends and relatives, when they are denied the right of water to drink and bread to eat. My God! what is coming next in this land of law and freedom? I want to say that the time has come now, shame to our flag and country, when Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor, through to-day's papers, arrogantly and threateningly tells us that we have not the right to pass a law proposed by a Member of Congress; that if the Cummins bill, forsooth, is passed, he and the American Federation of Labor will absolutely disregard it; that they will ignore it; that they will deliberately disobey the law of the country as passed by Congress.

Are we going to sit here supinely? How much longer? How much longer, I ask you, colleagues? If a Member of Congress should maliciously attack and assault and take the life of his fellow man, he would be guilty of murder, and he would be punished. If a Member of Congress locks up a poor, innocent telephone girl because she refuses to strike and denies to her food and water and the boon of being visited by friends, he would be guilty of a most serious crime against the laws of his State. If Members of Congress went out here to some plant and by threats, assaults, and malicious killings tried to stop men who were working for their bread, they would be guilty of a most heinous conspiracy against the laws of our land, and they would be accorded the maximum punishment. And yet we permit lives to be taken, to be ruthlessly taken, by angry strikers in the face of the law, with Samuel Gompers applauding. I want to know how much longer we are going to permit this anarchy to prevail in the United States of America. I want to know to what maximum degree of heinousness we are going to permit the laws of this country to be violated and acts of anarchy continued to be committed in our land until we are going to wake up like men and say to Samuel Gompers and his various unions forming the American Federation of Labor: "You have got to obey the law the same as every other citizen of this land, for Congress is going to compel you to stop this lawlessness." That is the question we are going to have to vote on now within a very short time. That is a question that confronts us all. That is the biggest question that has ever confronted Congress, if you please.

What are you going to do when the time comes? Are you going to have the papers say that the Committee of the Whole does so and so, and then when we come into the House and you and I come to go down on record the papers will say we would not stand hitched on the question? "That when Mr. Gompers puts us to the real test and reminds us of his threat to take our jobs away from us the House once again bolted the action of the Committee of the Whole and once again obeyed the mandate of the labor autocrat?" How many more times is that to be done in this House of Representatives? Let us all steel ourselves for this great test. Let us all girt ourselves with our whole armor, so that, unflinchingly, we may, like men, meet this great supreme test when it comes.

I want to say that I believe that 90 per cent of the people of the United States have their eyes on this Congress. I want to say that 90 per cent of the citizenship of this land are looking to us to restore law and order. I want to say as to the soldiery who have come back from France, who offered their all in the World War, who in trenches, cootie infected, knee-deep in mud, and blood-drenched with dead bodies, fought for the flag they loved for $33 a month and their keep—I want to say that we can depend upon that soldiery to restore order in the land and to make even the members of the American Federation of Labor, including their all-powerful president, obey the law.

I take my hat off to the biggest man in this House, in my judgment; I take my hat off to the most courageous man I ever heard speak on the floor of this House, and that is the distinguished, able, big-hearted, patriotic gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], who, brave as a lion, spoke here yesterday words that it took courage of the Marne to speak. It took courage not surpassed by any that ever crossed no man's land for that man to tell us what was in his heart and in his mind and in the hearts and minds of the people of this country. I take my hat off to him. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCFADDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2910. An act to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild, reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee," approved April 5, 1916.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment to the title of the bill (H. R. 9091) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Hennepin to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Minnesota River.

AMENDING THE FEDERAL CONTROL ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ESCH. We have only one more speech on this side.

Mr. SIMS. If you will turn to page 3, line 8, of the bill, where it says—

That during the period of Federal control the right to initiate or change rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices exercised prior to the 29th day of December, 1917, by the carriers now under Federal control, shall hereafter be exercised by the President.

I shall move to strike out the word "President" and insert the word "carriers.'

Then, on page 4, beginning at the end of line 2, I shall move to strike out all in italics down to and including line 13 to the word "to." Then on the same page, in line 19, after the word "formerly," I shall move to strike out all the rest of the paragraph down to and including line 2 on page 5.

I may present the other amendment, but I shall have to formulate that first, as to further liability of the Government after the commission has passed on the rates.

Mr. Chairman, I have no other demand for time and will not use any further time.

Mr. ESCH. I thought the gentleman from Texas desired time.

Mr. SIMS. He has notified me that he does not desire any further time.

Mr. ESCH. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is a Senate bill which makes about four changes in section 10 of the Federal control act.

The Federal control act was passed after the President took over the railroads, and section 10 provided amongst other things that the President should have the right to initiate freight and passenger rates. It deprived the Interstate Commerce Commission of the power it had had hitherto of passing upon rates before they became effective, that is, the power of suspension. That power in the Interstate Commerce Commission had grown up after many years, under the interstate commerce act. It was the power to suspend the rates for a period of 120 days when they were proposed by the carriers, and thereafter for another period, not exceeding six months, if they had not had sufficient hearings. It also provided for 30 days' notice. When we passed the Federal control act we put all the rate-making power in the hands of the President of the United States, who delegated that power to the Director General. We provided, of course, that the Director General should file the tariffs with the Interstate Commerce Commission, but we gave the Interstate Commerce Commission no power to suspend the rates, and therefore the Interstate Commerce Commission became merely the agency through which the Director General, as representing the President, put the rates into effect. There was no requirement for any notice to the shippers, except that the act provided that the President might give such notice as he should desire.

Of course in the Federal control act we preserved the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to review any particular rate when it was assaulted by a complaint, but that was all the power that we left with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Those of us who were here when the act was passed recall that there was a great division of opinion among the Members of Congress as to whether the power should be lodged in the President or in the Interstate Commerce Commission to initiate rates, and as to whether or not this power of suspension should be taken from the Interstate Commerce Commission. But during the war the President initiated rates through the Director General. The President, of course, had nothing to do with it personally. He initiated the rates through the Director General, who did it by means of freight-traffic committees that he had over the country. They investigated, made reports to him, and he initiated the rates. He put into effect a sweeping horizontal increase throughout the entire country.

Every person who has made a study of the transportation question at all knows how vitally the question of freight rates enters into every particle of our business life, how communities depend entirely for the existence of their factories upon a particular rate. The long-and-short-haul clause, with all its difficulties, and the relief from it, and all those elements enter into the problem. Nevertheless, the President put this horizontal increase into effect, practically without notice and without opportunity of hearing on the part of the shippers, and immediately they began to change and they have been changing ever since. Great hardship was worked on the shippers at the time, but they were willing to put up with it and have in an admirable way stood for those changes, although in many cases men lost vast sums of money on contracts because of the changes that were made.

But the war is over now. We must have Federal control because we have not yet had the opportunity to enact the legislation that is necessary before Federal control terminates and before the roads are returned to their owners for private operation. Now, during this time there is every reason in the world why this power should again be restored to the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend rates, so that the shippers who directly come in contact with the question, who really represent the consuming public of 110,000,000 people, may have their day in court and an opportunity to show that proposed rates are inequitable and that proposed rates in a particular instance are too high.

The committee proposes by this bill to correct that evil. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] seems to think that it is a remarkable thing that we should undertake to do that without taking out of the hands of the President and the Director General the power to initiate rates. It is a very natural thing to do. The Director General represents the railroads and through the organization knows the situation. He initiates the rates, proposes what the rates shall be. The Interstate Commerce Commission may put them into effect within 30 days or a shorter time if they deem it necessary, but if the rates seem to them to require examination and study they can take the time to do it and hear all pareits concerned. It does not seem to me that it is an unusual thing to do.

But the gentleman from Tennessee says if the President is not to have the power to put these rates into effect he ought not to be given the power to initiate them. The Government of the United States, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, passes on the question. The President is one of the agencies of the Government of the United States and the Interstate Commerce Commission is the other. The Interstate Commerce Commission is a tribunal which has had experience for years in examining these particular questions, and they ought to be granted that power.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I quite approve of the purpose of the bill and of the remarks which the gentleman from Indiana is making with reference to the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, as it seems to me, it requires a body of experts which will have ultimate authority to determine whether the rates are proper or not. I think the gentleman from Indiana will agree with me on that point.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not quite sure, however, as to one of the provisions of the bill, and that is my principal reason for rising. The amendment presented by the committee on page 4 reads:

> Except that the amendment of August 9, 1917, to section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, which provides that until January 1, 1920, no increased rate, fare, charge, or classification shall be filed, except after approval thereof has been secured from the commission, shall not be applicable to rates, fares, charges, or classifications initiated or changed by the President.

Does that apply simply to the rates heretofore initiated?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It applies in the future as well. I think I can make that clear to the gentleman. That is a provision of an act passed August 9, 1917. It is not the general power of suspension by the Interstate Commerce Commission at all. It was an extra precaution put into the law that even before the rates were filed they should have the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission if it was a proposed increase.

We do not propose to put that additional check on the President. We propose to leave the President free to initiate the rates and file them, merely having this check on the arbitrary power of the Director General that before they become effective they must be subjected to the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend their taking effect until examination can be made.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand the gentleman, this would not affect the provisions of the general law?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; and with this exception gives an absolute right to the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend all interstate rates during the same period.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am much obliged to the gentleman; I was under a misapprehension as to that condition.

Mr. WEBSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WEBSTER. It has been stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that if this legislation is enacted it will interfere with the Government in the operation and control of railroads. Is it not a fact that the Director General of Railroads in his testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce stated that this measure if enacted would not interfere with the operation of the roads and would not hinder him in the least?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. He stated that so far as the Interstate Commerce Commission is concerned. I do not remember what his statement was as to the other features. He said he had been in consultation with the Interstate Commerce Commission in fixing the rates, and it would not materially affect it. The Director General is opposed to the bill.

Mr. WEBSTER. He said that the enactment of this legislation would not embarrass him in the operation and control of the railroads.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not recall that particular statement.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. There is an inquiry at my left from the gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to the wisdom and the necessity for the clause as found on lines 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 of page 4, which reads:

> Provided, That no change or increase shall hereafter be made in intrastate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices without having first secured the approval of the proper State regulating tribunals conformable to the laws of the several States.

The gentleman has not explained the necessity for that, and I would be very much obliged, as would my colleague, if he will do it before he resumes his seat.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I may say to my colleague on the committee that he has asked me a rather embarrassing question. He has asked me to explain the necessity of an amendment that I am personally not in favor of, and I later intended to so state. I personally intend to oppose that amendment, and I will give my views about that in a short time. Here was the situation: The bill came to us from the Senate with the provision that the Interstate Commerce Commission might have authority with reference to interstate commerce—that intrastate rates could be changed, but that 30 days' notice must be given, and I have carefully studied that, and according to my view of the Senate bill when it came to our committee the power was left in the Director General, without any interference by any commission to deal with intrastate rates. This proposed amendment restores to the State commissions their several powers to pass on any future change of rates, and the committee was of opinion that that was a wise thing to do, because they were near at hand and knew more about it than an interstate commerce commission would.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Is not this also true, that the action of the committee was largely influenced by the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Northern Pacific Railway Co. against the State of North Dakota, which decision was filed June 2, 1919, in which the Supreme Court quotes the provision of the Federal act and says:

> Conclusive as are the inferences they are superfluous, since the portion of section 10 as previously reproduced in the margin in express terms confers the complete and undivided power to fix rates. The provision is that during the period of Federal control, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires, the President may initiate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission, which said rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices shall not be suspended by the commission pending final determination.

And the Supreme Court in that decision ruled that this applied not only to interstate rates but it also applied to intrastate rates, and were we not largely guided in introducing this portion of the amendment by the effect of that decision?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would hate to undertake to say what induced the amendment, as I was not in favor of it, and of course I could not know what was in the minds of those who favored it, but the gentleman has called attention to something that I ought to emphasize, and that is that this power during Federal control to initiate rates and the power granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend rates has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I think in a very sound decision, to apply to all the rates, both interstate and intrastate, so at the present time the power lies in the President to initiate the rates. He uses the Interstate Commerce Commission as the agency by which all of the rates are published and the Interstate Commerce Commission has complete power to review upon complaint any particular rate, whether interstate or intrastate.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. The President initiates a rate and that becomes the rate unless there is an appeal made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, if this bill be enacted.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No. The President initiates the rate, proposes the rate; then there is 30 days' notice; then the shippers come in for a hearing, and then if there is sufficient ground in the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission they may suspend the taking effect of that rate for a period of four months, during which they can hold hearings upon it. Then they may either let that rate stand or may change the rate, and establish what the commission decides is the just rate.

Mr. EMERSON. Then there would be no way for the President to initiate the rate and let it go into effect until they pass on it? Could the President initiate an increased rate, for instance, and let that rate continue on while the Interstate Commerce Commission is deciding the question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No. That is the very thing that we correct in this act. The proposed rates do not go into effect unless the Interstate Commerce Commission thinks they ought to go into effect, and that may be before extended hearings, or after, but it can not be more than four months originally and then be extended for another period of six months.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With reference to this proviso, that no change or increase shall hereafter be made in intrastate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices without having first secured approval of the proper States' regulating tribunals, conformable to the laws of the several States, it appears to me to make the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission less than it was before Government control, because the gentleman is aware that under certain conditions——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I might say to the gentleman, anticipating what he is going to say, that the rule in the Shreveport case—is that what the gentleman has in mind?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the gentleman's interpretation of the act as it is is correct, and I think that if my motion to give all of the power to the Interstate Commerce Commission is not carried, there ought to be an amendment making it clear that the rule in the Shreveport case is still to be applied, because it is not the intention of the committee to change that rule.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It seems to me there ought to be at least an amendment making the rule such that it would not apply where the intrastate rates affect the interstate rates.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The rule in the Shreveport case should be preserved at all events.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WEBSTER. I want to refresh the gentleman's memory with reference to the questions propounded a moment ago. I read from the hearings held by the committee in connection with this bill, on page 47, from the statement of Mr. Hines:

> Before taking up that matter in detail I wish to explain briefly the present policy of the Railroad Administration in dealing with these rate matters and to say that our methods of cooperation with the Interstate Commerce Commission are so close and so cordial that I believe the change in the law giving the commission the technical power to suspend rates initiated by the President will have little, if any, practical significance. So that if it is the purpose to do that I do not anticipate it will embarrass the Railroad Adiminstration or indeed change its procedure in any important respect.

Does not the gentleman now recall that testimony?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I know now that it is there, because the gentleman has read it. It was my recollection that he did say that with reference to the actions of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. I ask for information. Under the old rule what authority did the Federal Government have over intrastate rates?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Federal Government under the present law, or under the law before the Federal-control act was passed, dealt only with intrastate rates when they were found to be discriminatory or prejudicial; in other words, come within the rule in the Shreveport case.

Mr. HULINGS. So that speaking generally the Federal Government had no right whatever in fixing intrastate rates.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. HULINGS. But after the Government took over the control, the President, as a war necessity, was given the right to initiate all rates.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. He is given charge of the whole system of railroads, the entire unified control.

Mr. HULINGS. Now, if that is true, what is the objection to the provision here that the State regulatory tribunal shall have authority to fix rates in intrastate commerce? What is the objection?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I shall be glad to give the gentleman my views on that question. This bill is not passed yet, not signed by the President yet, and it appears it probably will not be until the 1st or the 10th of October. We are going to have some general railroad legislation in here, and I hope before the 1st of January we will be able to return the railroads to private operation. This bill applies only during Federal control. At best it can be only a matter of two or three months——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman from Tennessee could loan us five minutes? I think he has not exhausted his time.

Mr. SIMS. I have surrendered it. If I have any time I have promised to yield to Mr. JONES of Texas. I promised him, but he did not happen to be in the room at the time. I am perfectly willing to yield five minutes——

Mr. ESCH. Notwithstanding the rule, I ask that the time for general debate on this side be extended for five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. ESCH. I ask unanimous consent, notwithstanding the rule of the House on Calendar Wednesday, that our side be allotted an additional 10 minutes, to be given to the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent, notwithstanding the rule, that the gentleman from Indiana may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman's request is, notwithstanding the rule of the House, that the gentleman's time be extended?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the gentleman's request.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to indulge in the practice of changing the rules by unanimous consent in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. I do not believe that the committee has the authority to do it even by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Indiana, of course, can get 10 minutes under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request.

Mr. CANNON. Do not we all the time under the five-minute rule by unanimous consent change the rule? I think both the gentleman and myself have done so frequently.

Mr. SIMS. I think I lack 12 minutes of consuming all my time, but I have surrendered the time, but I am perfectly willing, if I can have it back, to yield to the gentleman from Indiana. Mr. JONES, to whom I promised the time, very kindly agrees to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman could regain his 12 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Then I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will pardon me somebody asked a question which I desire to answer. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will now give heed I was going to tell the gentleman what objection I had to this provision.

Mr. HULINGS. I will be very glad to hear it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. We have only two or three months at best of Federal control. We have Federal control over these roads. We do not have State control; we do not have control by the carriers. We have placed the power and the responsibility for control and operating these roads and for obtaining the necessary revenues to operate them or to determine the part of the revenues that they could obtain upon the Federal Government. Now, if the suggestion which I have made should be adopted and the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given the authority to rule on these rates, that is a tribunal of the Federal Government and a very proper tribunal to pass on those things. The President of the United States is going to initiate those rates. Are we going to send the President of the United States on another trip around this country to visit these different States to deal with each of those 48 regulatory bodies? Of course, gentlemen, there is no use disguising the fact that if we are going to propose by this bill to make the President of the United States obtain the consent of 48 different regulatory bodies within the next three months, if we are going to put it without his power to change the rates, if we want to do that, we can do it in the bill in about three lines by just saying that the rates shall not be changed. But that is not our policy. He has had the responsibility. The gentleman from Tennessee is afraid that if we give the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority that the President will not be able to put in his rates, and hence if there is a deficit—and goodness knows we have got a big enough deficit now—and that we ought to leave the power to initiate in the hands of the President, and we ought not to try to cripple that power so as to make it meaningless. We are merely giving a check upon the power by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have a present check by complaint. But if the suggestion I have made is adopted we will have a check on that power with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in determining the question whether you are going to have a horizontal increase, in determining any question that may arise in reference to a unified system as a whole, it is one question. It is not 48 questions, and it ought to be one power and it ought to be the power of the Federal Government. That is the reason I am opposed to it.

Mr. SIMS. Now, is it not in fact and effect robbing 48 States of the opportunity in time of peace to do in reference to interstate commerce what you ought to give the Interstate Commerce Commission to do in time of peace in reference to interstate rates?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not at all. The gentleman from Pennsylvania just cited the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, held all of the time since this Federal control act was passed, that the power lay within the President and the Interstate Commerce Commission over every single rate and that the exercise of that Federal control was irrespective of interstate rates or intrastate rates.

Mr. SIMS. They could go in——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. We propose during Federal control not to rob them of anything.

These State commissions have not had any power or authority during Federal control with reference to these roads, and it was a very wise thing not to give them power, because the unified control and responsibility was in the Federal Government.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Is it the fundamental purpose of this bill to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to suspend any rate inaugurated by the President?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; that is my opinion of it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Does it not require the President, before he inaugurates any rate on an intrastate railroad, to secure the approval of the public service commissions of the several States?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It does. But if this proposed amendment was adopted——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. As I read the bill——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That part is in italics and is merely a proposed amendment of the committee. As it came from the Senate it does not require that.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Under existing law, when a rate is inaugurated by the President, does not the 30 days' notice have to be given?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. When a rate is inaugurated by the President under existing law, does not the Interstate Commerce Commission have the right to investigate as to the reasonableness of the said rate and cure discrimination?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Before it goes into effect?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. After it is in effect.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Upon complaint—an individual case to be presented upon complaint.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The sole purpose, then, of this bill is to prevent a rate inaugurated by the President, for the purpose of producing funds to operate the railroads, from going into effect until the Interstate Commerce Commission says it shall go into effect?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. How is that going to benefit and assist the Government in the operation of the railroads during the last six months?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I might answer the gentleman by saying we have not the sole question of helping the Government in running the railroads. The question presented to us is how best to handle these transportation lines and railroads in the interest of the public. Perhaps arbitrary power is the easiest way, so far as the body exercising the power is concerned, but we do not grant arbitrary power, and there are other interests at stake.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Are not the roads to be surrendered the 1st of next January?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I assume they will be surrendered along about that time. And I might say, since the gentleman is asking the question, that I do not believe these roads are going to be surrendered until we pass the necessary and needed legislation in passing from Government to private control. I do not think the President, if we do not have the general railroad bill passed by the 1st of January, is going to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery by surrendering these railroads.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I believe the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to have this power not only to make rates but to fix wages.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Under existing law, as I understand it, after the President has fixed a rate the right of an appeal in an individual case lies with the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the justness of the rate?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. But that is after the rate is fixed?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; and gone into effect.

Mr. REAVIS. Without this amendment the approval of the several railway commissions of the several States is a condition precedent to the fixing of the rate?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. In one case it is an appeal after the rate is fixed and in the other case it negatives the right to fix the rate in the absence of that approval?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

I have not mentioned the greatest effect of the power given to the State commissions. The greatest difficulty is that the rates will not go into effect at the same time. The Interstate Commerce Commission will say that they will go into effect in 40 days. Now, one of these commissions will act promptly and another may not act promptly, and some will be in line with the action of the President and some will not. Take the State of Illinois, and we have many surrounding States which ship into Chicago. They are interstate shipments. Those rates would be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. They might be raised 25 per cent. In the meantime the Illinois State commission, in reference to all State shipments within Illinois, might say, "We do not think that is just, and anyway we are going to have a rehearing and try and have it argued further." That might take 40 or 60 days after the interstate rate, which would make an absolutely discriminating rate. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention in the two minutes I have left to the logical effect of what may take place. Now, we retain the power in the President to initiate rates, both in intrastate commerce and interstate commerce, and then give power to the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend both State and national made rates, both intrastate and interstate rates, and when the Interstate Commerce Commission approves a rate it becomes a rate for intrastate commerce just the same as for interstate business; then, how are the State commissions to function? All you have got to do to keep the power in the Federal commission forever is not to repeal this much of this law, and go through the farce of the President initiating the rates, and then have the Interstate Commerce Commission approve them and make valid the rates within the States as well as in the Nation. That is all you have got to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, there is practically only one section of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the section will have to be read through on account of the committee amendments. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

"SEC. 10. That carriers, while under Federal control, shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under State or Federal laws or at common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control. Actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any action at law or suit in equity against the carrier, no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government. All final judgments on causes of action arising during Federal control for a plaintiff or plaintiffs rendered in actions for personal injuries or for loss of or damage to property shall be promptly paid by the Director General of Railroads either from the operating revenue of the defendant or defendants or the revolving fund herein created, and final judgments based on claims accruing prior to Government control shall be paid by the Director General of Railroads out of such compensation as is or has been agreed to be paid to such railroad company. Nor shall any such carrier be entitled to have transferred to a Federal court any action heretofore or hereafter instituted by or against it which action was not so transferable prior to the Federal control of such carrier; and any action which has heretofore been so transferred because of such Federal control, or of any act of Congress or official order or proclamation relating thereto, shall, upon motion of either party, be retransferred to the court in which it was originally instituted. But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such Federal control.

"That during the period of Federal control the right to initiate or change rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices exercised by the carriers now under Federal control, prior to the 29th day of December, 1917, shall hereafter be exercised by the President, or by the Director General of Railroads, but such right as to interstate commerce shall be exercised under all the limitations and conditions which were imposed upon said right by the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended; and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have as full and complete authority and jurisdiction to set aside, change, modify, suspend, or otherwise review all such rates, fares, charges, classifications, and regulations directly affecting interstate commerce as though the Government had not assumed the possession and control of said transportation systems: Provided, That no intrastate rate shall be increased until at least 30 days notice of the proposed increase has been given to the shippers of the State in which the increase is proposed and a hearing granted. To that end the said act to regulate commerce, as amended, is hereby declared to be in full force and effect with respect to rates, fares, charges, classifications, practices, and regulations, anything in the act approved March 21, 1918, to the contrary notwithstanding. The procedure before the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be the same as formerly, except that the President or the Director General of Railroads shall stand in the stead of the carriers, and all notices theretofore required to be given to or served upon carriers shall be given to or served on said Director General. All orders or findings of the commission shall bind the Director General to the same extent as they formerly bound the carriers.

"In determining any question concerning any such rates, fares, charges, classifications, practices, or regulations, directly affecting interstate commerce, or any changes or proposed changes in the same, the reasonableness thereof or any discrimination therein, the rule to be applied shall be the same as existed under the said act to regulate commerce, as amended, and under the general law of the subject as it was prior to the Government's possession and control."

In computing the time allowed in the present law for presenting claims to the Interstate Commerce Commission for reparation, the period of Federal control preceding the passage and approval of this act shall be excluded, and, likewise, in computing the time for presenting claims or bringing suits for loss or damage arising out of the transportation of persons or property, the period of Federal control prior to the passage and approval of this act shall be excluded.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I suppose it will be in order to consider the committee amendments as they occur in the text of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. SIMS. And those are to be considered before any others?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. And then other amendments can be taken up seriatim?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, insert after the word "control" the words "or with any order of the President consistent with this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 10, insert after the word "exercised" the words "prior to the 29th day of December, 1917."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment which modifies somewhat that committee amendment. It is as follows: Strike out after the word "practices," in line 10, page 3, the balance of that line, and all of line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the words "of carriers under Federal control."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: On page 3, line 10, after the word "practices," strike out the balance of the line and all of line 11 and insert in lieu thereof the words "of carriers under Federal control."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment, as the committee has amended it, gives the President the power of initiating all these rates, fares, charges, and so on. But it happens that some carriers in some States have no right of initiation. In fact the rates may be initiated by the regulatory body. So if we put in the words "of carriers under Federal control" we obviate that discrepancy which does exist in some of the States. That is the reason for the modification of the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Do I understand your amendment to still use the words of the committee amendment—

Prior to the 29th day of December, 1917.

Mr. ESCH. No; my amendment is in lieu of those words.

Mr. BLACK. Then your amendment is a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; practically a substitute for the words I move to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, strike out the words "prior to the 29th day of December, 1917."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "or by the Director General of Railroads."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 14, after the word "interstate," insert the words "or foreign."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 21, after the word "regulations," insert the word "directly."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 22, after the word "interstate," insert the words "or foreign."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 24, beginning with the word "Provided," strike out the remainder of the line, all of line 25, and lines 1 and 2 on page 4, up to and including the word "granted," and insert in lieu thereof: "Except that the amendment of August 9, 1917, to section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, which provides that until January 1, 1920, no increased rate, fare, charge, or classification shall be filed, except after approval thereof has been secured from the commission, shall not be applicable to rates, fares, charges, or classifications initiated or changed by the President: Provided, That no change or increase shall hereafter be made in intrastate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices without having first secured the approval of the proper State regulating tribunals conformable to the laws of the several States."

Mr. SIMS. One of the amendments that I want to offer comes in lines 8 to 13 on page 3. If the amendment which I propose to offer in advance of this amendment is adopted, then I will be in favor of the motion to strike out this amendment; but if the other amendment is not adopted, then I would be in favor of retaining the committee amendment. Therefore I think I ought to offer the other amendment before this amendment is voted on.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the Chair will recognize me, I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. SIMS. This can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, which I will send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana to the committee amendment: Strike out of the committee amendment, after the word "Provided," all of the remainder of line 9, all of lines 10, 11, and 12, and all down to and including the word "States" in line 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That during the period of Federal control the rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices of all carriers under Federal control shall be subject to the provisions of this act, and all the laws now in force and effect with reference to rates, fares, charges, regulations, and practices, notwithstanding the fact that the commerce may be wholly within a State."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is drawn to carry out the purpose that I expressed in the remarks I made a few moments ago. This simply gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to suspend all rates, whether interstate or intrastate. Without this amendment the power would be in the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to interstate rates, but it would be in the several State regulatory bodies with reference to State rates. As I said a while ago, there will be only two or three months more of Federal control. Unless we intend to prohibit changes in freight rates, it seems to me that this amendment ought to be adopted. I think that this bill is a wise bill——

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman think that local people should be required to come all the way to the National Capital in order to get some little local rate changed?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that at the present time the local people have no regulatory body to go to to get an intrastate rate changed.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under this law, though, as the committee have amended it, they would have.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Do you not think that your amendment would practically deny to local people any relief, in view of the limited time which the National Government will retain control?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not at all. Our commerce is 85 per cent interstate commerce.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am talking about the other 15 per cent.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Only 15 per cent is State commerce. Now, if the shipper has to deal with the question of a shipment from Terre Haute, Ind., to Peoria, Ill., he has to deal with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Is it any more difficult for a shipper from Peoria to Chicago to come over here, as you say—as a matter of fact very frequently he does not have to come to Washington—is it any more difficult for him to go before the Interstate Commerce Commission than it is for a shipper interested in a rate from Terre Haute, Ind., to Peoria, Ill.?

Mr. JONES of Texas. You would make it hard for the last shipper.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would put them on an equality.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not fully understand the purpose of the gentleman's amendment. Why would it not be as well to strike out the proviso and leave the powers in the Interstate Commerce Commission, where they were before?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This is amending section 10 of the Federal-control act. If we merely strike it out, that would be an intrastate rate without any supervision by anybody.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We would have the same rule that we had before; in the event that they conflicted with the interstate rates, the interstate rates would prevail.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is true, but I think there should be some check on the power of the Director General in all the rates.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In the proviso of the committee amendment there is included the phrase "that no change or increase shall hereafter be made in intrastate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices." Under the law as it now stands the Railroad Administration has absolute power over every little petty service, ruling, or local custom or practice that prevails, and the shippers, the interested parties, have to come down to Washington and register a complaint with somebody who has not the slightest conception whatever of the local conditions. Take the city of Minneapolis and the city of St. Paul, 10 miles apart between the depots. Men who had merchandise to ship from Minneapolis to St. Paul had a custom which had grown up for years, which was absolutely changed by the Railroad Administration, and these shippers had to come to Washington, and had to come to Washington on several occasions, to get it righted. It seems to me that in local matters those things ought to be left to the people of the localities, who know something about it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will make it five minutes; I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, this bill only affects transportation while it is under Federal control.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; specifically limited to that.

Mr. CANNON. It is fairly to be presumed that Federal control will cease early in the coming year. The gentleman's amendment, if I understand it, places the same rule on intrastate commerce as on interstate commerce only during this short period of Federal control.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, in Illinois and Indiana I think we had better leave it as it is now. Otherwise we will have all kinds of trouble and never will get anything settled until the law expires.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman from Indiana will yield, supplementing what the gentleman from Illinois has said, I want to say that if we pass this legislation it will set a precedent for other legislation that will come up for consideration, which means the absolute elimination of all State and corporation commissions, and the House ought to be warned of that fact. Oklahoma has had exactly the same experience as has been related by the gentleman from Minnesota. Our corporation commissions have been here time after time for 18 months trying to get a hearing and trying to get action by the Director General, but never have got it until a few days ago. If the authority over these commissions is centered in the Interstate Commerce Commission, it means good-by to the average, ordinary citizen in the State, because he will never get any hearing. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman from Oklahoma seems to be worried about going on for two or three months during which the State commissions will not have any control over the intrastate traffic. He forgets that during all the time of Federal control the State commissions have had no control or authority over intrastate traffic. One of the reasons, if the gentleman please, that I am so insistent in regard to this is because the Director General of Railroads in the hearings, when he appeared before our committee, said that they would destroy the rate-making machinery. I want to read what he said, and he knows more about this matter than anybody else. Of course I would not leave the whole matter to him, because he ought to have some check on his action.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield before he goes further?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. It might be fair to say also that the Director General did not indorse the bill as it passed the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I have stated in my remarks already that the Director General was not in favor of this legislation. Here is what the Director General said, and I am reading from the hearings from the testimony of the Director General of Railroads:

As I look at it, the United States Government for the time being has assumed responsibility for the railroad situation, because it has taken over the railroads and it has guaranteed a rental. It has got to find, either through taxation or revenues, the necessary funds to pay the expenses and pay the rental. Therefore there is involved a single indivisible question of national policy in regard to this matter of railroad revenues.

We all know that the theory upon which there has been a separate study and decision in regard to the reasonableness of intrastate rates has been through some sort of a process of attempting to separate the expenses of doing the intrastate business from the expenses of doing the interstate business; and then on the basis of that separation to compare the revenues of the intrastate business with the revenues on the total business and the expenses of doing the total business, and besides that relation the intrastate rates bear to the total rates or the rates on the interstate business. That is a matter that is largely theoretical and admits of all sorts of different conclusions. It is exceedingly difficult to get any two people to agree upon any formula for that separation. If the Government in charge of the railroads and responsible for them, and committed to carrying out some reasonable and just national policy relative to this situation, is nevertheless dependent in arriving at the revenues which are to be charged, upon a wholly independent study of this subject in each State as to the intrastate business, we have there a complete division of authority on a matter in regard to which the Federal Government has a single indivisible responsibility.

It has seemed to me, therefore, that the original section 10 of the Federal-control act, which contemplated a unified policy as to rates and a unified responsibility as to rates, certainly should be the proper policy during the time of Federal control.

An additional consideration of importance in that connection is that this now is an emergency situation of very great seriousness. The railroads will not remain in Federal control for any very considerable additional time. In that time the Government doubtless must decide upon a policy as to how it is going to discharge its responsibility in connection with the return of the railroads to their owners. To a large extent the Government is helpless in deciding upon that policy, because as to all intrastate rates the matter is to be left exclusively to the determination of the various States, no one of which is charged with any responsibility for the general policy—if the Government in carrying out its own single and indivisible responsibility in reference to this great problem is without any authority to deal with that great bulk of the revenues which comes from intrastate business, and if as to each matter is exclusively in charge of the State authorities, looking at it from a State standpoint, it seems to me that it is impossible to carry out the conception of the Federal-control act, which was that the Government had taken possession of the whole situation, was responsible for it, and must deal with it in a responsible and effective way.

During the reading the time of the gentleman from Indiana again expired and by unanimous consent he was given five minutes more.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is the statement of the Director General of Railroads.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Does not that argument apply just as much to giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to suspend the national-made rates as it does to the argument to which the gentleman applies it?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not at all; and I will read a little more in reference to that matter.

Before taking up that matter in detail I wish to explain briefly the present policy of the Railroad Administration in dealing with these rate matters and to say that our methods of cooperation with the Interstate Commerce Commission are so close and so cordial that I believe the change in the law giving the commission the technical power to suspend rates initiated by the President will have little, if any, practical significance. So that if it is the purpose to do that I do not anticipate it will embarrass the Railroad Administration, or, indeed, change its procedure in any important respect.

Of course, it will give to the country the knowledge that we have an absolute legal check on the Railroad Administration, because he now will deal with the Interstate Commerce Commission—not in an advisory capacity, but the commission will have the legal power and responsibility.

Mr. SIMS. In other words, the Director General expects to persuade the Interstate Commerce Commission, but is afraid he can not do that with 48 commissions.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; and that is all right. The Director General, after he initiates the rates, ought to try to persuade the Interstate Commerce Commission to enact them, but on the other hand you will have the other interests trying to persuade the Interstate Commerce Commission the other way, and the result will be a decision that will be just.

Mr. Chairman, while I am heartily in favor of this measure, and think its enactment will be a wise step toward bringing stability to the business of the country, I am very much opposed to the amendment proposed by our committee, which would require the approval of the State commissions of any change in intrastate rates. The laudable purpose of the Cummins bill is to afford a hearing for the interests vitally affected thereby before any change is made in the rates. It gives an additional check against the power of the Railroad Administration to make a change in the rate structure.

It must be remembered that during Federal control the entire procedure with reference to the filing of the schedules of rates has necessarily been changed. The Director General explained the procedure very concisely, as follows:

Our general procedure with respect to rates has been this: Even at the outset of the Railroad Administration the contention was that these matters ought not to be left to railroad men. So the first director general selected Hon. Charles A. Prouty as Director of the Division of Public Service and Accounting, and in that capacity it was understood that his concurrence must be obtained as the representative of the public in changes of the rate structure. So that while the technical work was done in the Division of Traffic, yet the Division of Public Service, represented by Mr. Prouty, must concur in what was done, and if there was a disagreement between the Division of Public Service and the Division of Traffic, the disagreement was to be submitted to the director general for consideration.

In addition to that, we appointed, in order to facilitate careful consideration of these matters, these traffic committees. Originally they consisted of two railroad men selected by the Division of Traffic and one representative of the shippers selected by the Division of Public Service. This year, shortly after I became director general, Mr. Prouty requested to be relieved of a part of his work, and it was arranged that he would give up the public-service part of his work and retain the part relating to accounts. I then appointed Mr. Max Thelen as the Director of the Division of Public Service, to devote his whole time to representing the interests of the public in all these matters, and since his appointment his concurrence has been necessary in these rate matters, and in the event of any disagreement between him and the Division of Traffic that disagreement has to be submitted to the director general for consideration.

Since Mr. Thelen has been appointed Director of the Division of Public Service we have increased the public representation on these traffic committees to two, where there were two railroad men, so that the committees are evenly balanced. On some of the larger committees there were three railroad men and two representatives of the shipping public, and to those committees an additional representative of the shipping public has been added, so that there has been equal representation—two or three men representing the Division of Public Service, selected by it from shippers, and two or three, as the case might be, representing the Division of Traffic, and selected by it from railroad men. It has been our policy in these matters, as I have already said, to keep in the closest touch with the Interstate Commerce Commission and to make any changes in the light of the advice which it might give.

In addition to that, it has further been our policy with respect to intrastate rates, in every case where it was at all possible, to keep in touch with the State railroad commissions and get the benefit of their advice. (Hearings, p. 48.)

This is the established machinery of the Railroad Administration for establishing a rate structure and for making changes in any established rate structure. In the case of Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. North Dakota (U. S. Supreme Court, June 2, 1919) the Supreme Court of the United States decided that under the Federal-control act both interstate and intrastate rates came under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Hence all rates are now filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The purpose of the Federal-control act was to give unified control by the Government of all the transportation facilities of the country, and in carrying out the purpose of the act all distinctions between intrastate and interstate rates have been obliterated, with the exception that the Director General has sought advice from the State commissions from time to time.

We must not assume that the purpose of this act is to prevent any increase in the freight and passenger rates. If that were the purpose, Congress could by an act of three or four short lines bring about such result. Granted that the purpose of the legislation is not to prevent the increase of freight rates, then we must afford the facility by which, if desired, this may be done in the most logical way. Assume that the bill passes with the amendment recommended by the committee, which restores the State commissions to their power, with reference to future changes, and that the Director General desires to make a change in the rate structure. He will wish to determine, first, what additional revenue is needed; second, what change in freight rates will yield this revenue. Having to initiate all rates, both interstate and intrastate, he will make his computations embrace the whole rate structure. Then what follows? First, he must separate the interstate schedules from the intrastate schedules. He files the interstate schedules with the Interstate Commerce Commission; he must then file separate schedules with each of the 48 State commissions. After 30 days, unless the Interstate Commerce Commission exercises its power to suspend the rates and in the event of the exercise of such power at the end of the suspension period, the interstate rates go into effect. In the meantime the Director General has sent his representatives to appear before the several State regulatory bodies. Each of such bodies has its own method of procedure, its own provisions with reference to the length of notice and the kind of hearing, including the right to petition for rehearing, and so forth. If it could be assumed that the different State regulatory bodies would finally approve the schedule recommended by the commission, obviously many of the changes in the interstate rates might not become effective before the effective date of the intrastate rates. The State bodies would be sure to make some changes, and all this would, of course, entirely upset any calculation with reference to the aggregate revenue to be secured by the proposed change.

This, however, is the least objectionable feature. The greatest objection is that discriminations would at once be brought about all over the country. For instance, suppose the interstate rates had gone into effect with reference to shipments in Chicago. Every shipper whose shipments were destined for Chicago outside of the State of Illinois would have to pay the advanced interstate rates. All of the Illinois shippers would still be under the lower intrastate-rate structure. This would put the coal mines of Indiana out of business temporarily or occasion them severe loss. Shippers between points within the State of Texas would be operating under the old schedule, while shippers outside the State whose freight was destined to points in Texas would be compelled to pay the new freight rates. Situations like those presented in the Shreveport case would be multiplied all over the country. All the delicate machinery of the freight-rate structure throughout the country would be thrown into utter confusion, and this confusion would undoubtedly exist at the date of the relinquishment of Federal control over railroads. Without question it is the intention of Congress, for a short time at least, to retain the prevailing rate structure at the time Federal control ends. Thus the confusion would be carried far into the period of private control. Of course, the bill retains the right to bring up the question of discrimination of intrastate as against interstate rates in the manner in which the question was presented in the Shreveport case, but it would take hundreds of cases involving almost endless litigation, covering a long period of time, to make such an adjustment, and in the meantime the very purpose sought to be attained by the present bill would be thwarted. The shippers of the country have complained bitterly and with much justification against the ills of rate structures put into effect arbitrarily by the Director General; but in fleeing from those ills they do not want to "fly to ills they know not of." The amendment which I propose leaves the jurisdiction of all rates, interstate and intrastate, during Federal control, with the Interstate Commerce Commission, a Federal tribunal, where it should be lodged.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The Railroad Administration during the period of its control raised the express rates 10 per cent, did it not?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And in connection with that did they not submit their data to the various State commissions throughout the country, and did not something over 40 out of the 48 comply with the new rates immediately?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And the remaining number complied very shortly thereafter?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not know about that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does not that show a spirit of cooperation?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not know about that. All but five complied—and do you want to put it into the hands of five States in this Union to disrupt the whole scheme of rate making?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Here is what I want to do: We are now out from the war, and I want to get back to local control and not have everybody trotting down here to Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman and I are in accord in respect to that, and within the next 90 or 100 days I hope we will be back under private control; but in the meantime I do not think we ought to rob the agency of the Federal Government into whose hands we place this responsibility of the power to do what is right in the whole country with respect to all these rates with which they have the right to deal. [Applause.]

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, in order to get at the meat of this problem, let us first inquire as to what is the necessity for the legislation. The necessity for this, if there be a necessity at all, arises from the fact that on the 21st day of March, 1918, we passed a Federal-control act, by the provisions of which the President and the Director General appointed by him took over all of the transportation lines of this country except some of the smaller lines. By the provisions of that act the Director General had the right to fix all of the rates upon the different transportation lines of the country, and he did so fix them. By the decision of the Supreme Court in the case which I referred to only a few moments ago, and which decision was rendered June 2, 1919, this power conferred by the Federal-control act applied not only to interstate commerce, but it applied as well and as thoroughly to intrastate commerce. Therefore it follows logically, as a matter of law, that all of the power of the intrastate commissions, to wit, the State commissions, so far as rate making was concerned, was absolutely void if the President or the Director General under him desired to and actually did fix the rates; and the Supreme Court so said. By this legislation we propose to do what? Read on page 3, and follow me, commencing at line 17:

> And the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have as full and complete authority and jurisdiction to set aside, change, modify, suspend, or otherwise review all such rates, fares, charges, classifications, and regulations affecting interstate or foreign commerce as though the Government had not assumed the possession and control of said transportation systems.

Namely, restoring to the Interstate Commerce Commission the powers that it had prior to the Federal-control act. Now read further, turning to page 4:

> Except that the amendment of August 9, 1917, to section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, which provides that until January 1, 1920, no increased rate, fare, charge, or classification shall be filed, except after approval thereof has been secured from the commission, shall not be applicable to rates, fares, charges, or classifications initiated or changed by the President.

That is one exception, and now comes the exception to which the gentleman from Indiana refers, namely:

> Provided, That no change or increase shall hereafter be made in intrastate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices without having first secured the approval of the proper State regulating tribunals conformable to the laws of the several States.

Therefore we have this clean-cut proposition, that we are restoring to the Interstate Commerce Commission the supervision of the rates except in these two specific cases, to wit, where the President initiates them during the period of Federal control, and, secondly, that he must secure the approval of the State commissions before they can become effective.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], boiled down, is just this, that all commerce, whether it be interstate or intrastate purely, shall be subject solely to the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the residuum and final analysis of his amendment. Am I correct in stating that?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Purely Federal control.

Mr. DEWALT. The other is mere verbiage. It boils itself down into that clean-cut proposition—shall the Interstate Commerce Commission during the period of the war control the entire supervision of all the commerce of the United States whether it be interstate or intrastate purely?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, of course that refers only to rates, fares, charges, classifications, and so forth.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And has nothing to do with police powers.

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly not. It refers only to the period of Federal control. Let us reduce a little further. Under the Shreveport case, with which all of you who are lawyers are familiar, there was a great deal of dissatisfaction. The Shreveport case decided explicitly that where there was a discrimination which was harmful to interstate commerce, or which was discriminatory against the residents or citizens of another State, no State could pass a law making a fare which was discriminatory against the citizens of another State or as against interstate commerce.

There was a great deal of grumbling about that, but it became the law of the land and people are now satisfied with it. But this amendment goes still further, and the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana says that the State authorities, that Pennsylvania with its 10,000,000 people, that Illinois with its 8,000,000 people, that Indiana with its large population—and, by the way, Illinois had a larger area of railroad mileage than any other State in the Union with the exception of Texas—that these great Commonwealths shall surrender their power as to the supervision of clearly intrastate regulation of rates. To whom? To the Director General of Railroads and to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, gentlemen, I have heard a great deal of talk of the sovereign rights of the State, and as a Democrat, agreeing with a good many Republicans, too, I believe in the sovereign rights of the State. I believe, too, inherently in the paramount right of the Nation. I believe it is an indivisible union of sovereign States, as Daniel Webster said, and I believe this, too, that within the powers of the State there lies the regulation of its own affairs clearly within the State when they do not harm the citizens of another State, and therefore I am against the amendment of the gentleman. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman think that the passage of this particular amendment that is in the committee could really be used so as to nullify the decision of the Supreme Court in the Shreveport case in this way? Suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission authorized an increase of 15 per cent in interstate rates, and there is a like increase in intrastate rates; and suppose the State commission refuses to approve that rate, thereby leaving in force the present intrastate rate. Would not that nullify the Shreveport case?

Mr. DEWALT. It follows conclusively from the mere statement of the fact and the reading of this amendment. And another thing follows just as clearly, and that is if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is passed in place of the amendment as in this bill you might just as well notify your various Commonwealths, the 48 of them, that they shall abolish their State commissions.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not know whether I understood what the gentleman meant when he answered the gentleman from Texas. Does the gentleman mean to say that if the State commission of Texas refused to raise the rate and the Interstate Commerce Commission did raise the rate that that would create a discrimination under the rule of the Shreveport case?

Mr. DEWALT. Not of itself; no. The gentleman's question, as I understood it, was this, and if I am mistaken he will correct me: The Interstate Commerce Commission in a certain instance fixes a rate, we will say, of 15 per cent in advance of what the other rate was. Now, by the provisions of this amendment as now framed, he puts the question to me, Supposing the State does not agree to the raise, then does it become nugatory? Yes; it does; because this provides they must first have the allowance of the State commission. Then the next question was whether it would nullify the decision in the Shreveport case. There I say no.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I thought the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not understand each other.

Mr. DEWALT. Because the Shreveport case says this, in substance, that no State can pass any law or make any regulation in regard to rates which is harmful or discriminatory as against interstate commerce as interstate commerce or as against the citizen of another State. That is the meat of that decision. Now, it would not make any difference whether the consent of the State authority was to be had on that. If it did discriminate against interstate commerce and if harmful to a citizen of another State in interstate commerce, it would become ineffective under the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will permit, it was only in connection with that particular provision; but Congress comes on, following that decision of the Supreme Court, and says that the State commission shall have the veto power in those rates, and unquestionably we would have the same situation which the Supreme Court faced in the Shreveport case without any power anywhere to correct it.

Mr. DEWALT. Well, if the State authorities assumed or undertook to pass a rate which was not consistent with the rate as established by the General Government in interstate commerce, the rate as established by the General Government would be paramount to the rate as established by the State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. I do not think I will take over five minutes on this question. I do not want the committee to get the impression that the committee that reported out this bill did not give the most serious and painstaking consideration to this committee amendment. It involves a question that is very far-reaching and very important. This is going to come before the Congress in the proposed legislation that will soon be reported out by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce fixing a permanent policy of the Government with reference to the railroads of the country. And that question is as to just what shall be the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to the regulation of railroads and fixing the rates, charges, and fares, and what shall be the jurisdiction and power left to the various State commissions and other State regulatory bodies. Now, there are two different schools of thought upon that question. There are some who believe that the time has come when the Federal Government should take exclusive control of all those questions affecting all railroads, intrastate and interstate. There are others who believe we must preserve the dignity and the power and the authority of the State commissions or State regulatory bodies with reference to intrastate questions or rates.

Of course, there is also involved, over and above it all, the question of constitutional power. Now, my friend from Indiana, the gentleman who has just offered this amendment, if I do not misunderstand his position, is one of those who believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to permanently have exclusive control over the fixing of all rates, intrastate as well as interstate; and so he is perfectly consistent when he offers this amendment to this bill for solving the question temporarily doing away with all further powers of the State commissions and State regulatory bodies. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] a while ago, when he asked him the question, hit the nail right on the head when he said, "If you do not look out you are going to commit the Congress here to a policy that may hereafter prove embarrassing." And so I want the committee to bear that in mind.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does not every railroad in this country favor giving exclusive jurisdiction to the Interstate Commerce Commission instead of the State commissions, both as to control of intrastate and interstate rates?

Mr. DENISON. Of course they do. They do not want to be bothered with the State commissions. But that is such a far-reaching question, it is a question of so great importance to the people of the country themselves, that the Congress ought to study it very carefully and hesitate before enacting an amendment here to-day of the kind that is proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Now, I do not think that this particular amendment to the Senate bill as reported by the committee is going to seriously embarrass the Railroad Administration. I do not think the State commissions will take any position that will embarrass the General Government now. Why? One reason will be because they know that if they do it they are liable to meet with permanent legislation pretty soon that will do away with their powers, if Congress has the constitutional power to enact such legislation. So I think that, in view of all the conditions, the State commissions will take a broad and liberal view and a patriotic view of this question so long as the railroads remain under the control of the Federal Government and will approve any reasonable regulation of rates that may be proposed by the President during the continuance of Federal control.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Gentlemen, we are all very much interested in this rate-making power, where it rests and how it operates. Under existing law during the period of the war the power rests solely with the President of the United States to make rates. He delegated that power to the Director General of the Railroads undoubtedly, because through that agency rates are in effect fixed and have been fixed during the period of the war.

On May 29 last there was put into effect a new classification of freight rates on imported goods from the Pacific coast to eastern points. I have spoken on that subject before, but I want to call your attention to existing rates which, in my opinion, are a great injustice to our own people, our own manufacturers and producers. First of all, let me call your attention to the rates fixed for a long haul and a short haul. I believe we should enact into law a measure that will prohibit the charging of a greater freight rate for a short haul than is charged for a long haul. Under existing law, wool from San Francisco to Boston, which city is the great wool market of the United States, a carload of wool, of 20 tons, pays $500 plus the 3 per cent internal-revenue tax of $15. On a carload of wool from Nevada points to Boston the freight rate is $990 plus the internal-revenue tax of $29.70, or, in other words, a carload of imported wool is carried under existing freight rates, fixed by the Federal Government, at $515 from San Francisco to Boston, when a carload of the same kind of wool and of the same number of tons, from Nevada points to Boston, pays $1,019.70. In other words, the freight rate from San Francisco to Boston on imported wool is 2½ cents a pound, while on Nevada wool, a haul of 500 miles shorter, the freight rate is 5 cents a pound lacking a fraction. In round numbers double the freight for a haul of 500 miles shorter than that which is charged on imported wool.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. Is not the difference in rates accounted for in some measure by the fact that the San Francisco wool would have water transportation?

Mr. FORDNEY. If it is shipped from San Francisco, but from an interior point in California it pays a domestic rate.

Now, let me go further, and refer to one other article. To Chicago, Ill., the freight rate is $56 per car greater on domestic goods than on the imported goods of many kinds. This is the minimum excess charge. And so on a great many other items all along through the list. And then we come down to sugar. I want to pick out the extreme cases. There is a discrimination in favor of imported sugar against domestic-made sugar in California of at least $56 a car to any point east, but on certain points it is still greater. From San Francisco to St. Paul the freight rate is $616 per car, and from Helena, Mont., to St. Paul it is $856 per car, including the internal revenue 3 per cent tax, a discrimination of $247 a car, while the haul is 835 miles shorter.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. GRIFFIN. How many tons to the car?

Mr. FORDNEY. Forty tons to the car.

Now, then, between San Francisco and Chicago it is $560 per car, while to La Crosse, Wis., it is $96 greater, but a shorter haul. As my time is limited, I will not attempt to give you all the rates, but let me go a little further.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object to this, but will object to any further discussion outside of this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thought I was talking to the bill, because it fixes rates, my friend.

Mr. SIMS. This bill does not fix rates at all.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not want to discuss the matter if it is not in order, but it is a subject of great importance, and I thought it related to the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Before the railroads were taken over by the Government at all, wool rates from San Francisco and other coast points to Boston and other eastern points was $18 a ton, and from Reno it was $80 a ton.

Mr. FORDNEY. I know.

Mr. SIMS. It is practically the same.

Mr. FORDNEY. I know there were discriminating rates against domestic goods before this. I hope the gentleman will let me proceed. I know that those things existed before, but they are greater now than then. I will show you why. For instance, California is the greatest bean-producing State in the Union to-day, and on imported beans from the Orient to eastern points from San Francisco to New York the freight rate on a carload of imported beans is $718.40 less than on California beans. I say that is unjust.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FORDNEY. In just a minute. Let me finish this statement and then I will yield.

California is one of the greatest States in the Union in the production of canned goods. On canned goods from San Francisco to New York the rate is $544.50 a car, plus internal-revenue tax of 3 per cent, or $16.34. But if shipped to Chicago, Ill., the rate is $1,087, plus the tax of 3 per cent, or $32.63, making a discrimination of a total of $559.25 a carload, and it runs that way all the way through. But when it comes down to goods produced by the packing companies of the country, the freight on the domestic product is less than if the goods were imported. Somebody seems to have some influence there. It is the only exception I know of.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is it?

Mr. FORDNEY. Eight hundred and twenty-five dollars from San Francisco to Chicago on the imported article, and from Goldfield, Nev., or San Francisco, $725, or $100 a car less.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the reason for that?

Mr. FORDNEY. I know of no other reason on earth than that somebody must have had some influence. I do not want to impute dishonesty to any man.

Let me quote you rates from New Orleans to interior points as far north as Tennessee. On some goods to Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, and Tennessee points 16½ cents per 100 pounds on certain imported goods and 26½ cents on the same kind of domestic made goods between the same points.

Now, the same condition prevails from New York to New Orleans. The rate of freight, taking points halfway between New York and New Orleans, is about double the freight rate that is charged from New York to New Orleans and from New Orleans to New York. It is a water rate, of course, but the point is, my good friends, that if the railroad companies can carry at a profit goods from the Pacific coast or seaport towns to another seaport town, why not carry domestic made goods at the same rate? And if they can not carry those goods from one seaport town to another seaport town at a profit, then they must be carried at a loss, which the taxpayers of this country must make good, and they should not be permitted to do it. [Applause.] If there is a loss to the railroads on the long haul, then the shippers on the short haul must pay an excessive rate to make up that loss; thus that portion of the shipping public suffers through the dishonesty or incompetency of the railroad managers.

At this point of my remarks I wish to insert a list of rates for a long and a short haul:

This policy upon the part of the United States Railroad Administration has not been confined to the establishment of import rates via Pacific coast ports, for such rates to some extent are now being carried via Gulf ports. As you may be interested in this additional information, I am quoting below import asphalt rates established in September, 1918, from Mereaux, New Orleans and Baton Rouge, La., to certain southeastern points, showing the domestic rates at the same time. These rates are all published in cents per hundred pounds to apply on carload shipments.

Tariff authority: Illinois Central Freight Tariff Foreign 180-M. I. C. C. J-5223. Louisville & Nashville Import Freight Tariff Ex-511. I. C. C. 283.

As evidence of the way the people's money is being squandered by the Railroad Administration or Government control, I wish to read a newspaper clipping from, as I remember, a Chicago paper of recent date, forwarded to me by the Hon. W. B. Mershan, of Saginaw, Mich.:

A Wabash Railroad water tank, operated by electricity, is tended by a farmer who turns on the switch in the morning, works all day at his own business, and turns the switch off at night. For this he was formerly paid $20 a month. Under the Government Railroad Administration he was classed as an electrician, his time was figured for the entire day, and he was allowed $300 a month and given over $2,500 back pay.

Mr. Hines, the railroad administrator, in a letter recently addressed to me, admits that there are employed at present on the railroads 140,000 more men than were employed at the time the Government took over the roads. This seems to me to be extravagance in the extreme.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN rose.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] be limited to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the debate on the pending amendment be limited to five minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] makes his speech?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana as an amendment to the committee amendment: Page 4, line 9, after the word "Provided," strike out all the remainder of line 9 and all of lines 10, 11, and 12 down to and including the word "States," in line 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That during the period of Federal control the rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices of all carriers under Federal control shall be subject to the provisions of this act and of all laws now in force and effect with reference to rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, practices, notwithstanding the fact that the commerce may be wholly within a State."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, replying for a moment to the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], I will say that of course these rates are higher now and the differential is more than it was before Federal control obtained, for the simple reason that the rates are higher.

As to his last remarks about the long-and-short-haul proposition, that is with us and has been with us always, and in all probability will be with us in the years that are to come.

Now, as to this amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], it draws the issue clearly. No amendment that I have ever seen offered in this House on any bill draws the issue more clearly between those who believe in centralizing all the power of the Government in Washington, absolutely robbing the States and all their commissions or tribunals of any power and placing them in Washington, than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana. I have read a great deal in my life about the Federalists and anti-Federalists and what they believed. I have read a great deal about strict constructionists of the Constitution and loose constructionists of the Constitution. I have read a great deal about centralization, but with all good feeling and in all friendship I must say that when it comes to being a centralizationist I believe my good friend from Indiana takes the rag off the bush.

This amendment simply does this, and I support it for the reason that it means a return to a sane policy of regulation of the rates on the railroads and transportation companies of this country. We are going back, because it is no longer a war time, to a settled policy of a generation with reference to rate making in this country, and if the House had done what I sought to have it do when the railroad-control act was up, and what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] by his amendment sought to have it do, the Interstate Commerce Commission would not have had the power of veto over proposed rates taken away from it, and I do not believe that it ever should have been. But the argument was then made—and it was a hard kind of argument to resist—that the Government was charged with running the railroads, and therefore there should be nothing that would come between it and its power and its right to operate the railroads and not create a deficit against the Federal Treasury. Therefore the amendment to take this power away from the Interstate Commerce Commission also takes away from the State commissions the power to set aside rates, or, in other words, the power to veto rates initiated by the carriers or the President, who stands in the place of the carriers.

Now, the war is no longer on. We are starting back to peace times with the railroads. [Applause.] Then if we are going to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power that it had before Federal control, which was taken away from it during the war, why not go the whole hog and give back to the State commissions that which is justly theirs? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana) there were—ayes 20, noes 82.

Accordingly the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 4, line 9, beginning with the word "Provided," strike out all of the proviso.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, that is not a part of the bill yet. That is an amendment that will have to be voted on.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have offered an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of restoring the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I want to restore them fully and completely. I had some doubt about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS]. That amendment gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission some powers which it did not possess before. The amendment which I have offered would simply leave the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission exactly as they were before we entered upon Federal control. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] pointed out very clearly how on page 3 of the bill these powers were given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, by providing that—the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have as full and complete authority and jurisdiction to set aside, change, modify, suspend, or otherwise review all such rates, fares, charges, classifications, and regulations affecting interstate or foreign commerce as though the Government had not assumed the possession and control of said transportation systems.

Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] and those who support the committee amendment will agree with me that, though ordinarily the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission were limited to interstate rates, yet where rates established by the State commissions conflicted with or nullified the rates established by the Interstate Commerce Commission, or imposed a discrimination upon a citizen of another State, then under the decision in the Shreveport case the rates established by the Interstate Commerce Commission would prevail.

The importance of this matter in this particular case is this: As the committee amendment stands, all of these rates must be examined to see whether they conflict with the rates established by the 48 different States, and if a State established an intrastate rate, it has the right to have that rate prevail, notwithstanding any action that the Interstate Commerce Commission may take, and no matter how much it may conflict with that act. This, in my opinion, so complicates the situation as to make rate changes difficult if not entirely impracticable.

Mr. HULINGS. The President now has the right to fix intrastate rates. Before the Government took over the railroads the Interstate Commerce Commission had no right to fix the rates for intrastate commerce.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. None except as I have stated.

Mr. HULINGS. Except where an intrastate rate interfered with a rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. Now, if your amendment should pass, the President would still have the right to fix the rates for intrastate commerce.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; for his powers are defined by the bill.

Mr. HULINGS. He has that right now with this bill not passed.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With the bill not passed, yes; but the provisions on page 3 take care of that. He gets merely the power given him by this bill if it passes. An examination of the provisions on page 3 of the bill will show that under it he gets only the power which the "carriers" themselves had before Government control. The carriers or railways were always subject to State control on intrastate rates.

Mr. HULINGS. No; I beg pardon. The provisions on page 3——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will have to let the gentleman argue that in his own time. I think he is the only gentleman here who takes that view. The provisions on page 3 give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the same powers that it had before Federal railroad control was initiated.

Mr. HULINGS. It did not have the power before to fix intrastate rates.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It did not; that is true.

Mr. HULINGS. It would not have now.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It has the same control as before; and the State commissions, if my amendment prevails, will have the same power as they had before, because this bill does not give to the President any power whatever except as is expressly stated therein and is a substitute for the section which has heretofore given him control. So that the whole situation comes down to this: Is the Interstate Commerce Commission to have the power which it had before Federal railroad control or is part of it to be taken away by virtue of this bill? If all its former powers are to be restored, my amendment should prevail.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I do not favor the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. After railroad control was taken over by the Federal Government, the President alone had the right to fix all rates for interstate as well as for intrastate commerce carried on railroads. The Interstate Commerce Commission, after the Government took control, had no right or power to fix rates on interstate commerce. This bill, if passed as it is, provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the right to supervise or change rates that the President may make, and in addition to that it also provides that in intrastate commerce, for which the President alone has now the right to fix the rates, the State commissions may supervise and fix the rates. If the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa should pass, this would be the state of affairs: The Interstate Commerce Commission would have the right to supervise the rates for interstate commerce made by the President, but nobody whatever would have anything to say or any supervision of the rates which the President might make for intrastate commerce. It would leave his power absolute, just as it is now under the law of the Federal control of railroads, because the gentleman from Iowa strikes out of the committee amendment the right restored to the State commissions or tribunals to supervise the rates imposed upon strictly intrastate commerce, and leaves all power to fix such rates in the President or the Director General of Railroads, thus defeating one of the prime purposes of the bill, which is to get out of war conditions and put the commerce of the country back into peace conditions.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. The amendment I expect to offer on page 3 is that during the period of further Federal control the carriers shall initiate rates instead of the President. The carriers before the war control act initiated rates in intrastate commerce as well as in interstate commerce. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] will see that this is rather a cute way of initiating rates after the war in both interstate and intrastate commerce, giving nobody but the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to suspend the President initiated rates. Then the Interstate Commerce Commission would have the power both in interstate and intrastate rate cases and the State commissions would have absolutely no power.

Therefore to pass this bill would be for the very great advantage of the railroads in such States as Pennsylvania, Texas, New York, Illinois, Minnesota, and others, because the intrastate business in those States is 25 to 50 per cent of all the business in the State.

One of the greatest opportunities that a State commission has is to enforce proper service regulations within the State to take care of the local State service question. Now, when we give the President the power simply to initiate and let it go where it never could have gone except in the exercise of the war power, and as a result to give the Interstate Commerce Commission indirectly the right to control intrastate rates, that it never could have done in any other way, is doing something by indirection that could not be done in any other way.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not understand the last remarks of the gentleman to apply to my amendment. If it does, I ask if he agrees with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] on the construction given my amendment. Let me call attention to the fact that the powers given to the President on page 3 are not the powers of general legislation, but powers that the carriers had under the former practice.

Mr. SIMS. As to the making of rates which the commission had prior to the war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The President is given the same power the carriers had.

Mr. SIMS. I gave notice that if my amendment was adopted I would move to strike out all of this committee amendment, because it would be unnecessary. But we are voting on the committee amendment before mine has been acted upon. If this amendment is going to stay in at all, let it stay in bodily as it is.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The real effect of the gentleman's amendment would be to leave the bill, as far as the rates are concerned, as it came from the Senate.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GREEN of Iowa) there were 17 ayes and 53 noes.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 4, line 9, after the word "Provided," strike out the balance of line 9 and all of lines 10, 11, 12, and line 13, down to and including the word "States," and insert "State regulating tribunals, conformable to the laws of the several States, shall have the same control of intrastate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices as existed prior to Federal control: Provided further, That the President may appeal from any order or decision of such State tribunal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and such commission may modify, change, or annul the decision or order from which an appeal has been taken. During the pendency of such appeal the decision or order of the State regulatory body shall not be suspended by reason of such appeal."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I have offered contains three provisions. First, it restores to the State regulatory bodies their control over intrastate rates, fares, and charges the same as they had prior to Federal control. The second provision of the amendment gives the President the right to appeal from the decision of the State regulatory body to the Interstate Commerce Commission and gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to modify, change, or to annul the decision of the State commission, and the third provision is that during the pendency of the appeal the order of the State commission shall not be suspended by reason of the appeal.

The reason that I have offered the amendment is simply this: I am as thoroughly convinced as I am convinced of any other economic proposition in this country that our transportation systems have become national in their character, and that there must be some centralized body, like the Interstate Commerce Commission, having the final power of decision over rates. I do not see how we will ever have a just and uniform system of rates without this power lodged in the commission. I do not think there is a Member of the House of Representatives who is more emphatically opposed to Government ownership or to all of these socialization schemes than I am, and yet I realize that unless something is done to make our transportation system an effective national organization, with an effective centranized control, with a power and ability to earn a reasonable rate on its investment, sooner or later we are bound to have Government ownership. Capital will not continue to invest in railroads without at least a reasonable prospect of fair returns. I also realize the dangers of centralization. I realize the difficulties and the hardships on citizens of a State who have come here to Washington to secure changes in rates which are purely intrastate in character, and what I favor is that which I have expressed in this amendment, to let the State commission have jurisdiction over the intrastate rates, let it hand down its decision, and then let the President, under Federal control, or the carrier, after we turn the roads back to private control, appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and do not suspend the State rates during the pendency of the appeal, but give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power of final hearing, for good cause shown, to modify or annul the decision of the State commission.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman state on what ground the President would be allowed to urge an appeal as a reason for reversing the decision of the State tribunal?

Mr. BLACK. The ground would be as now provided in the interstate-commerce law, that the rates were not reasonable and just or were discriminatory in their character.

Mr. DENISON. That is not provided in the present law.

Mr. BLACK. No. In the present law, known as the Interstate Commerce Commission act, no appeal is provided from a State commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman see that unless you specify the ground that the President can present to the Interstate Commerce Commission on which to reverse the decision of the State commission, you might as well do away with the State commission altogether?

Mr. BLACK. I would not object to an amendment that it should be specified in the appeal that such decision or order of the State commission must be unreasonable or discriminatory. I would have no objection to an amendment of that kind, because that is exactly what I had in mind when I drew the amendment which I have offered, and I do think we are bound to adopt some kind of system similar to the one I have suggested or sooner or later have chaos in our transportation systems. I do not think there is any wisdom in going back to the old system of having 48 regulatory bodies over the United States with rate-making powers and from the mistakes of which as to intrastate rates the carriers have no redress except to go into the courts and allege and prove that the rate is confiscatory. I do not wish to be understood as making any attack on the State commissions. Many of them have rendered very valuable service, and will continue to do so. But what I do contend is this: The history of rate regulation in this country has demonstrated beyond doubt, I think, that we must have a national rate structure, and in order to prevent serious confusion and disorder it is necessary to have some central authority with final power to adjudicate rates, both as to interstate and intrastate traffic. In my opinion, it will either come down to that or to Government ownership. I certainly do not want the latter contingency to happen.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. I thoroughly agree with his statement that it is bad to go back to the old system of having 48 commissions controlling the fixing of rates, and that some system must be devised that will do away with the necessity of these conflicting jurisdictions. But until some reasonable system is devised that will prevent the necessity of the individual and local organizations having to make the fight over the little individual rates it will be necessary to have local commissions. Otherwise the individual's rights are lost in the maze of the many questions that arise in rate disputes. I think the real remedy was suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] here to-day when he discussed the long-and-short-haul clause. When the final rate bill is up for disposition I shall offer an amendment which will forbid the charging of a greater rate for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction.

In other words, I think that water competition rates should be abolished and that no rate for a long haul should be less than for a shorter haul over the same line or direction. If you will adopt that system and put the rates of these entire United States on a uniform basis, then you can have one national commission that can settle all of these questions. But until that is done any locality is helpless that happens to be the victim of an unjust rate.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to know how you are going to bring about that uniformity with 48 State regulatory bodies putting into effect intrastate rates which under this amendment might be clearly discriminatory as against the interstate-commerce rates?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman, but I wish to state this: The changes, if and when made, should be made together. You should not undertake to make one correction without making the other along with it. If you will abolish water-competition rates and put all rates on a mileage basis, with a reasonable loading and unloading or terminal charge, then you can begin to talk about having a body that can deal justly with all communities in a uniform manner. But until that time arrives no finer method can be devised than the old State-commission system. I want to suggest one defect that arose out of the famous Shreveport case that has been cited here to-day. That case simply involved the rates on two short lines of railway in east Texas. The Interstate Commerce Commission set aside the State railway commission's rates and authorized uniformity on those two lines. The Texas railroads under the guise of complying with that order changed the whole system of rates in Texas and saddled upon west Texas a differential on both inbound and outbound rates, which made the rates 50 per cent higher. The Panhandle Chamber of Commerce spent three years before the Interstate Commerce Commission trying to correct that error that was put on us unjustly, and finally the Interstate Commerce Commission held that the differential that was placed on west Texas was unjust. But we had to suffer during those three years while the matter was pending, and hundreds of thousands of dollars in rates were unjustly collected from west Texas in the meantime. Why should a city that is situated on a body or stream of water have the additional advantage of lower freight rates? Why should the inland community be penalized to enrich the towns and cities located on or near navigable waters?

Now, if our question had been before the State commission, as it had been once before, we would have gotten relief within 30 days. So long as you allow a different adjustment of rates throughout the country and in different States—in other words, so long as that system of discrimination in behalf of water cities remains as we have it to-day, it is certainly foolish to expect a man or an organization which wants a simple correction in rates to come to Washington to have a hearing or secure a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission in order to secure his or its relief.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman understands my amendment provides that the State commission shall put into effect its order and decision and that the carrier, in this case the President, would have to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and during the pendency of that appeal the State rate would not be suspended.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand the gentleman's amendment is a little better than it would be if he did not have that provision in it, but nevertheless it still provides that a man, if he secures a correction in a 10-mile rate, must come to Washington before the Interstate Commerce Commission before he finally secures his relief. And when the President or anybody acting for him gives notice of an appeal to the commission here the man is helpless and hopeless in his effort to secure relief. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 4, after the word "classifications," strike out the words "practices, or regulations, directly," and insert the words "regulations, or practices."

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask a question of some member of the committee. I understand that the Senate is not going to take up any matters until the peace treaty is disposed of. Now, the railroad bill will be here, I understand, in two or three weeks, and the question is this: Why is it necessary to pass this bill in such a short time before the railroad bill comes in? I wish some member of the committee would explain that to me?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I thought I explained that in my opening address. Possibly the gentleman was not present at the time.

Mr. EMERSON. I was.

Mr. ESCH. But this bill has already passed the Senate, and if we pass it in the House it goes to conference and action on conference reports can be expedited, and it would not interfere necessarily with any consideration of the treaty in the Senate. It would not be a time-consuming proposition as it would be if it were originally put up to the Senate.

Mr. EMERSON. Well, it might be.

Mr. ESCH. Well, I doubt it very much.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 5, after the word "interstate," insert the words "or foreign."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. That disposes of all the committee amendments.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 3, line 13, by striking out the word "President" and substitute therefor the word "carrier."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SIMS: Page 3, line 13, strike out the word "President" and insert in lieu thereof the word "carrier."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, of course this amendment ought to have been acted upon before the committee amendment on page 4 was perfected. But under the ruling of the Chair the committee amendments must be first considered or acted upon before any other amendments. So if my amendment should carry it would be absolutely necessary in some way to eliminate the word "President" wherever it occurs in the same sense in the rest of the bill. Of course, if it is not adopted, that is the end of it. I tried as well as I could in my opening remarks to oppose leaving the power in the President to initiate rates and then giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to suspend them in both intrastate and interstate service. Now, if the railroads have the power to initiate rates, and then we restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to suspend and pass upon the interstate rates initiated by the railroads, then the intrastate rate initiated by the railroads will be subject to the laws of the States—whatever they are in each State—and consequently would restore the law just as it was before Federal control began, both as to interstate and intrastate rates.

Now, I can not see any other argument than those already made to require the President to initiate rates which may be immediately suspended. He may initiate them in both State and interstate and then they may be immediately suspended as to both by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission passes upon the rates, both national and State, both interstate and intrastate, and therefore makes it final and eliminates all power of the State commissions to act in any way whatever.

Now, just as long as we have private ownership of railways there ought to be competition, and there ought to be competition in regulation as well as competition in rates, and the only way to secure competition within the State and in intrastate service is to keep it in the State commissions, because they are local and know what ought to be done. Now, take great States like Texas, Illinois, New York, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, and California, that have an immense intrastate business and intrastate service, passenger as well as freight, and they will be absolutely superseded and set aside and their powers nullified, first, by having rates initiated by the President, and then having the Interstate Commerce Commission given the power to act finally on the rates initiated by the President and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. On page 3, line 21, strike out the word "and" and insert after the word "regulations," in the same line, the words "and practices."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ESCH: Page 3, line 21, strike out the word "and" after the word "classifications," and after the word "regulations" insert the words "and practices."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment to offer, provided the Chairman has no more to offer now.

Mr. ESCH. I have some others which I wish to offer.

Mr. SIMS. My amendment is to the last line on page 5. I will not offer it, however, until all the other amendments have been acted on.

Mr. ESCH. I have some to offer before that. On page 5, insert the word and numeral, "Sec. 2" before the word "In" in line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: Page 5, line 12, before the word "In" insert the word and figure "Sec. 2."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Wisconsin where that will leave section 10 of the original act of March 21, 1918. The bill as drawn is a complete amendment of section 10.

Mr. ESCH. It is.

Mr. WALSH. If you insert "Sec. 2" in this bill, I do not think it will make the section 2 a part of section 10, but it will make it section 2 of this bill, and will take it out of the redrafted phraseology of section 10.

Mr. ESCH. It is evident that the last paragraph of the bill has no relation to section 10 of the Federal control act. It treats of an entirely different subject matter, namely, the statute of limitations. We might designate it as "10 (a)," and that would keep its position in the Federal control act. I make that suggestion, that instead of making it "Sec. 2" make it "Sec. 10 (a)."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers a modified amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A modified amendment by Mr. ESCH: Page 5, line 12, before the word "In," at the beginning of the line, insert "Sec. 10 (a)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment. On page 5, line 15, strike out the words "passage and approval" and substitute the words "taking effect."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ESCH: Page 5, line 15, strike out the words "passage and approval" and insert in lieu thereof the words "taking effect."

Mr. ESCH. The purpose of that is, that it may be easy to conceive of a bill passing without approval as against a presidential veto, and the words "taking effect," I think, are more ordinarily used.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I make a like amendment in line 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ESCH: Page 5, line 19, strike out the words "passage and approval" and insert in lieu thereof the words "taking effect."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On page 5, line 20, after the word "excluded," add "that all further Federal control of all carriers shall cease within four months from the approval of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SIMS: Page 5, line 20, after the word "excluded" add "that all further Federal control of all carriers shall cease within four months from the approval of this act."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment speaks for itself. It seems to me that if this bill is going to pass and become a law as it is, the sooner the railroads know exactly when they will be finally called on to assume control, the sooner they can prepare themselves for that responsibility.

Now, as said by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] several times in argument, that it would not be more than two or three months, or something like that, until the roads would be returned. He seems to contemplate, that either by legislation or by the act of the President that the roads will be returned within two or three months. Of course, it is within the power of the President to release all the roads at any time under the act. But this amendment would shorten the time to four months, and if Congress has determined upon passing this kind of a bill to take away all power of the President to further protect the Public Treasury by making rates and having them go into effect immediately, subject to final action in case there is complaint by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the sooner this deficit is ended the better, and if they are going to be better operated and better controlled both for the public and the Public Treasury by the railroad owners themselves than by the Government, the sooner they are returned the better.

And so I do not see any use in talking at one time about 3 months' further Government control and at another time about 21 months. Four months will give time to the railroads to get ready to operate.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. The wording of the amendment is that "all further control," and so forth. Am I correct about that?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. What is the significance of the word "further"?

Mr. SIMS. I used it because it is in another place in the bill, in an amendment that has not been acted upon.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman be willing to reconstruct his amendment?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. Strike out the word "further."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman appears to have changed his mind as to the length of time. According to the bill H. R. 265, if I remember correctly, it was four years that he wished to have Federal control continue. Now, you are placing it at four months.

Mr. SIMS. I assume that this bill is to become a law. There is no use in keeping the railroads in the hands of the Government without power to do more than initiate rates. I am offering this amendment because of the refusal of the Committee of the Whole to accept the other amendment to allow the carriers to initiate rates.

Mr. SWEET. Then your amendment is in accordance with the provisions of this bill?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly. I think if the bill is to pass, the sooner we clothe the owners of the roads will full power and responsibility and the sooner we clothe the State and National commissions with full power and responsibility the better.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I insist upon it, in view of the fact that the pending bill amends section 10 of the Federal-control act, which deals with regulatory powers as to fares, rates, and charges, while the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee has relationship to the period of Federal control, which in turn is treated of in section 14 of the Federal-control act, to the effect that Federal control shall cease after a period not exceeding 21 months after the proclamation of the declaration of peace.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I think that is rather a strained point of order, but it might be sufficient to warrant the Chair in sustaining the point of order if the Chair thinks it proper. But the bill is dealing with Federal control of railroads, and my amendment provides that all Federal control shall cease within four months of the approval of this act—Federal control of all character. I think it is perfectly germane. I wish I was as hopeful of its passage as I am confident that it is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that unquestionably the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is not germane to the paragraph, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph on page 5. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes if I care to use that much time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I rise just to make a few general observations with reference to the bill. This bill has resulted from a demand arising from the country generally, from the shippers of the country; a very persistent and a very forceful agitation and complaint from the country generally, which has come to the members of the committee and Members of the House and Senate, no doubt with such force that the committee has felt that some legislation of this kind should be passed.

Now, when the bill was under consideration in February, 1917—the Federal railroad-control act—those Members who were here at that time will perhaps remember that there was opposition to certain provisions of the bill, and serious opposition, and a long and very interesting debate.

One of the provisions of the bill against which there was strong opposition was that which fixed the compensation that was to be paid for the railroads during Federal control. Many of us thought that the compensation provided for was too high; that is, that the standard return which was fixed as the average net operating income for the three years prior to the war, was not fair to the country exactly, because the three years selected for the fixing of the standard return were the three years in which the incomes of the railroads had been the highest of any three years in the history of the country. Now, subsequent events have proven that that complaint against the bill was well founded, and that that provision of the bill has partly contributed to the deficit that has since been found to result from the management and control of the railroads by the Government.

Another provision of the bill against which there was objection was this very provision that we are now seeking to change, the provision giving the President the right to fix rates. The committee will remember that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] offered an amendmen* known as the Sweet amendment. It was discussed here all day by those who were opposed to it and by those who were in favor of it. If you will pardon a personal reference, I may say I was one of those who were opposed to giving the President the power to fix rates on the railroads, as I shall show in a moment.

Another provision of the bill against which there was a great deal of objection was the provision which continued Federal control of the railroads for a period of two years after the war. That provision was bitterly contested. There were some who wanted it continued indefinitely, among whom was the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], if I remember correctly, and it was stated here by myself, as well as by others, that the basis of that provision in the bill as it was originally introduced was a desire to experiment with Government ownership; and subsequent events have proven that that suggestion was certainly well founded.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] offered an amendment to the bill at the time it was under consideration limiting the period of Government control to one year after the termination of the war; record votes were taken in the House both on that amendment and on the so-called Sweet amendment.

As these important and far-reaching problems arise in the House and are considered by the Congress we look at them with our eyes to the future and give them our best judgment as to how our solution of them will work. But sometimes it is quite interesting, after the years have gone by, to look backward at the same problems and see wherein our judgment was right or wrong. And sometimes it is interesting for us to go back and read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and see how the Members of the House viewed these problems at the time they came before us and how they would have solved them and how they voted on them. I have found considerable pleasure or interest in going back over the record of the discussion of the Federal control bill at the time it was under consideration, and that has not been so very long ago; it was in February, I believe, of 1917. At that time the Sweet amendment was presented to the full House and a vote was taken on it, and there were 165 who voted for it and 210 who voted against it.

I think that subsequent events have shown that the Sweet amendment should have been approved and embodied in the bill, and that the right to fix rates of the transportation companies in this country should not have been given to the President, but should have been left with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

On the Esch amendment there were 164 votes in favor of it and 205 against it. In other words, there were 205 Members who thought that the control should continue two years after the end of the war and 164 Members thought it should continue only one year.

The war, or the fighting at least, closed on the 11th day of last November. And since then the President has announced that he intends to return the railroads to their owners by the last day of this coming December. I think the country wants the railroads returned to their owners, and Congress will more than likely provide the necessary legislation so they can be returned within about a year after the close of the war.

So that subsequent events have shown the wisdom of the amendment proposed by the gentleman who is now the very able chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. ESCH]. If you will pardon another personal reference, I wish to state that I voted both for the Sweet amendment and for the Esch amendment. I wonder how many Members remember the vote on the final passage of the bill? On the final passage of the bill there were 339 yeas and 6 nays. Those who voted against the bill were Messrs. Chandler of Oklahoma, Gordon of Ohio, HAUGEN of Iowa, RAMSEYER of Iowa, THOMAS of Kentucky, and myself.

In explaining my position on the bill at that time I made the following statements, which appear on page 2713 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and which I trust I may be pardoned for quoting:

> I am opposed to that provision of the bill which would extend the time for returning the properties to their owners two years after the war, and I am opposed to this provision in the bill which gives this power to the President to fix the rates, because I can not see, and I have heard no argument yet from anyone that has convinced me, that the power of fixing the rates for the shipment of freight or any other rates is a war power.
> I do not think this bill should be passed with a single provision in it that could be construed as an encouragement to those who believe in Government ownership.
>
> Let us be candid with ourselves and with the country and make it plain that this legislation is a war necessity only.
> I will support the bill if it is amended so as to be what it is represented to be—legislation necessarily resulting from a state of war—and if some of the provisions of the bill that are absolutely inexcusable are eliminated from it.
> I am opposed to the Government keeping possession of the railroads two years after peace has been declared. I think that length of time is unreasonable and would be so held by the courts; it is also unnecessary, and is intended as a compromise with those who believe in Government ownership, or who would experiment with it. And I will not vote for the bill unless it is amended so as to provide for the return of the railroads to their owners in a less time than two years after the close of the war.
>
> I am unalterably opposed to giving the President or the Director General of Railroads, or any other one man, the power to fix railroad rates. It requires a most fertile imagination to conceive of the rate-fixing power as a necessary war power. It is not a war power at all. It is nothing more nor less than an abdication by Congress of one of its legislative powers and conferring it upon one man who we all know could not himself exercise it and would not exercise it.
>
> I have not heard one sound reason given during this debate why the Interstate Commerce Commission, that has heretofore had the right by act of Congress to finally determine railroad rates, should not do so while the roads are under Government control. Certainly the Interstate Commerce Commission is better qualified than any other person or any other tribunal in this country to determine reasonable rates. * * *
> I am willing to give the President the power to initiate rates during the continuance of the war as a war necessity, but the Interstate Commerce Commission should under any circumstances retain its authority to finally determine the reasonableness of the rates. * * *

And I will not vote for the bill if it contains the provision giving the President this power. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] will be adopted.

So far as I am concerned, I shall not vote for any measure that will confer upon the President or Mr. McAdoo or any other person any greater power than they now have unless I am convinced beyond all doubt that it is absolutely necessary to help us successfully prosecute and speedily terminate the war; and I will not vote for this bill if it contains the provision giving the President the power to fix rates of the railroads of the country.

I think, too, the bill provides compensation to the railroads for the use of their properties during the Government control that is excessive and is unjust to the people who will have to pay the bill.

Neither of the amendments, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] and by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], were agreed to by the House, as I have shown by the record of the votes, and for that reason the gentlemen whose names I have given and myself voted against the bill on its final passage. I felt then that our judgment was right, and I now feel that subsequent events have justified our judgment in voting against the bill. [Applause.]

By the passage of this bill here to-day Congress will restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission the rate-making power which never should have been taken from it in the original Federal-control act. When the railroads are returned to their owners the last of this year, the judgment of those of us who contended that Federal control should not extend more than one year beyond the close of the war will have been vindicated. And when Congress comes to consider the tremendous loss that the Government will sustain from operating the railroads during Federal control, and shall scrutinize the monthly deficit in the operation of the roads, it will then be admitted, as it is now already known, that the standard return or compensation which Congress provided for the railroads during their use by the Government was unreasonably excessive and has proven a great injustice to the American people.

And, Mr. Speaker, we so often, in looking back over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, find where our judgments on pending legislation were wrong and our prophecies with reference thereto have proven untrue, there is at least some satisfaction when we can look back and find that our judgment on such questions was right.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EVANS of Nebraska: Page 2, line 16, after the word "created," strike out the comma and insert a colon and the following:

"Provided, That all judgments based on damages occasioned by a defective construction, which defect existed at the time the railroads were taken over by the United States."

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to provide that out of the funds that go to the railroad these damages shall be paid. If you will read the bill on page 2, beginning with line 2, you will notice that—

All final judgments on causes of action arising during Federal control for a plaintiff or plaintiffs rendered in actions for personal injuries or for loss of or damage to property shall be promptly paid by the President either from the operating revenue of the defendant or defendants or the revolving fund herein created, and final judgments based on claims accruing prior to Government control shall be paid by the President out of such compensation as is or has been agreed to be paid to such railroad company.

The purpose of this amendment, as you will notice, is to require the payment of such damages as are occasioned by defective construction which existed at the time the railroad was taken over by the Government out of those funds which go to the railroad.

I think it is apparent to anyone, simply upon the statement of the case, that the damages occasioned by defective construction should not come out of the revenues paid by the people. If you allow the bill to remain as it is you will make the Government pay for the damages occasioned by the railroads' own fault, while if you adopt this amendment they will be paid out of the funds of the railroads.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say a word with reference to this amendment.

The bill as now drawn provides for the payment of damages, on all claims that were filed before the Government took over the railroads, out of the revenues that would go to the railroad companies, but all damages arising out of claims not filed at the time the Government took over the railroads will come out of the revolving fund, a fund that is naturally and inevitably paid by the people. The amendment of my colleague from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] provides that all claims for damages that arise because of faulty construction of the railroads before they were taken over by the Government shall be paid not out of the people's revolving fund, but out of the revenues collected that would go to the railroad companies.

I have in mind a very large number of cases that have been begun in the Middle West since the Government took over these railroads. They are cases founded in damage arising in part out of the following condition of facts: The railroad companies in building across the valleys of streams instead of building trestlework built solid embankments. These streams occasionally overflowed, filling the valleys with water. The natural escape for that water, of course, was through the valley of the stream, but encountering these railroad embankments and not being permitted to flow through, the water was backed up and covered the farm lands in that vicinity, where it would not go except for the careless and negligent construction by the railroads. Under the bill as now drawn every dollar of damages occasioned by the faulty construction of the railroads in putting solid embankments across the valley rather than trestlework will be paid from the funds of the people, while if the amendment of my colleague from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] is adopted the damages so occasioned will be paid out of the revenues that would go to the railroad company; and inasmuch as the railroad companies, in the first instance, were entirely responsible for the negligent and faulty construction of the railroads across these valleys, they should bear the consequences and pay the damages which their own action has occasioned, rather than to throw that burden onto the people by paying it out of their fund, which is known as the revolving fund. I think common justice would indicate the necessity and desirability of adopting the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would almost involve a lawsuit to determine which of those cases would come under the amendment?

Mr. REAVIS. I can not see how it would involve a lawsuit, for this reason: The railroads have been in existence there for years. These solid embankments across these valleys had been there for years.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I did not have any special reference to the gentleman's illustration, but I had reference to the various cases that could come in under the gentleman's amendment. Cases might arise from defective construction, from defects of the rolling stock, and various instrumentalities pertaining to the railroad company.

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; there would be many instances, of course, where there would be a question as to whether it was a construction before or after taking over the railroads. But the adoption of this amendment will safeguard the rights of the people in hundreds of cases concerning which there will be no question. It seems to me the representatives of the people in this House can hardly afford to so disregard the rights of the people as to compel them to pay damages occasioned by the negligent act of the company for which the people or the railroad control is in no way responsible.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose there is a little railroad here taken over that put on 40-pound iron, had not money enough to do otherwise, and then during Federal control that iron breaks—I suppose that would have to be taken out?

Mr. REAVIS. How can the gentleman fix the responsibility of the 40-pound iron on the people who had nothing to do with it?

Mr. CANNON. The Government, without being invited, took it over, and took it as it was. The compensation was fixed by the act, and they were to be returned in as good condition as when the Government took them over.

Mr. REAVIS. All of which I admit; but inasmuch as the Government had nothing to do with putting down the 40-pound iron in the first instance, where is the equity or the justice in forcing the people to pay the consequences of an act for which they were not responsible?

Mr. CANNON. I suppose there would be some litigation that would not result in the benefit of anybody except the lawyers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the period at the end of the bill and insert the following: "and such time for bringing suit shall be computed from the date of notice in writing properly presented to the claimant that his claim will not be allowed by the railroad company."

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was sent me by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, an organization made up of a great many merchants in the city of New York. In a letter accompanying the amendment were these statements, which, I think, cover the argument. It says:

The passage of this amendment we propose would settle the legal question involved and relieve the courts of hundreds of thousands of suits for small amounts which will be brought hereafter by shippers to recover losses and damages. The shippers will not stand for this new and arbitrary proposition, and will bring suits hereafter before the lapse of the two years and one day. This is an injustice to the shippers and a burden on them for which there is no reasonable excuse. Suits between private parties are seldom brought unless the alleged debtor has refused to pay or neglected so long to pay that the claim may be outlawed by the statute of limitations. The shipper has no reasonable ground for bringing a suit until he is informed that his claim will not be allowed, and he should not be forced to bring suit to protect himself until he is so informed.

I might add to that that I have had a great deal to do with railroads. I have had many claims against them in conducting water transportation in connection with them. You make a claim against a railroad, then there is investigation. It goes on, is not pushed very much, the two years slip by, and you have not begun suit and you are barred out. I have often noticed it when I was on friendly terms with the freight agent. He says, "Oh, yes, Mr. CLEARY; we will look it up by and by," but by and by the two years have slipped up, and I have not begun suit.

The purpose of the amendment is to compute the time from the time they refuse to pay the claim. They may take three or four years. If this amendment should pass, it would keep cases out of court, because people do not care to sue the roads, but give them plenty of time for investigation. We provide that the railroads shall first refuse the claim, and after that suit may be begun at any time. This has been pressed very hard, as the gentleman from Wisconsin knows. They asked me to introduce the amendment. It can do nobody any harm. If it is a good case, it ought not to be barred out. The statute of limitations in New York extends for six years. A case against a railroad ought not to be barred because suit has not been begun within two years. I hope the committee may see fit to accept the amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the present bill is very liberal in reference to the statute of limitations. It provides that the period of Federal control shall be added to the statute of limitations. I do not think it would be wise to undertake to make an additional provision here that it should date from the date of the absolute refusal by the railroad company to pay the bill. I do not think that would be a wise limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 10, after the word "Government," add the following: "Bills of lading, special agreements, shippers' receipts or other instruments issued by the common carriers relating or pertaining to interstate live-stock shipments shall, in suits for damages growing out of such shipments, be admissible as evidence only for the purpose of showing that a shipment was made, and shall not be admissible as evidence for any other purpose."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to do away with a condition that has produced a great many complaints. When a live-stock shipper tenders his cattle or his other live stock to a railway company he is presented with a great, long, yellow contract that has a lot of fine printing on it, for stopping to read which he would be "bawled out," which perhaps he would not understand if he did read, and which contains a lot of conditions and exceptions. For instance, one of the provisions frequently put in a contract of that character is that the shipper shall give notice of any claim for damages within one day after the arrival of the stock at the point of destination, or before they are taken out of the yards. Frequently an employee accompanies live stock and the owner is not there. Damages occur because of defective equipment or through negligence, or for some reason for which ordinarily the company would be liable, and yet, simply because notice in writing is not given within one day, within 24 hours of the arrival of the stock at the point of destination, the shipper is forbidden to bring suit. I have been informed by a number of lawyers—I have not had time to look the matter up recently—that the courts have held since the taking over of control by the Federal Government that such conditions are valid; and they also hold valid other statements in the contract, such as the fact that they must file suit within 60 or 90 days——

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Of course I have no knowledge of any court that has held that to be valid, but I doubt very much whether private contracts of that character, especially such an unreasonable contract, could be made effective to change the statute of limitations with reference to bringing suit.

Mr. JONES of Texas. They can make notice of damages a condition precedent to the filing of the suit.

Mr. REAVIS. My judgment would be that no such provision would have any force in law.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand they claim the contract is based upon a consideration—the same being what is asserted to be a lower rate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that, with regard to practically all of these special agreements, that they are usually printed in very small type, and that when these contracts are introduced the courts invariably have held that they are not good as against the shipper?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And the courts have protected the shippers against almost every one of those unreasonable agreements?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is very true in the State courts prior to the time that the Federal Government took control of the railroads, but I understand that under the Federal control that now prevails a number of our State courts have held these provisions valid. I know that in my own State most of these conditions are held to be invalid. I have had occasion to file some suits of this character, and, as I recall, the State courts have held that most of those provisions are without consideration, are discriminatory, and unreasonable. But I have complaints from a number of lawyers in my section of the country, which is a great stock-raising country, to the effect that the companies are putting a number of provisions in these different contracts with reference to the place of filing suit, and with reference to the notice that must be given as a condition precedent to a suit for damages. Also as to the time within which the suit must be brought. Even though these conditions and stipulations should be held invalid a number of trial courts are misled by the very fact that the provisions are contained in the shipping contracts.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do I understand the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to provide that the contracts of carriage, the bill of lading, may be offered in evidence by the shipper in the trial of a suit only for the purpose of showing that there was a shipment, and that none of its terms shall be admissible to show the contract between the shipper and the carrier?

Mr. JONES of Texas. No. Either party under this amendment may introduce it for the purpose of showing that a shipment was made and as to the amount and nature of the shipment. The question of liability would revert back to the common law or statutory liability, whichever might apply.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would not that in effect deprive the carrier of the right of contract concerning the terms of shipment?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Not at all. As a matter of fact practically every State in the Union provides or stipulates that there shall be common-law liability, or the various statutes of that State specify the conditions under which there shall be a liability on the part of the carrier. Now, if you have one standard contract with every shipper, and they are all on exactly the same basis, the carrier will know and the shipper will know the conditions of liability, and the matter can be gauged accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I make it, based upon the fact, as I gather the import of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, that it has reference more particularly to the so-called Cummins amendment, which was incorporated as part of section 20 of the interstate-commerce act, language of which in part is as follows, having reference very largely to cattle shipments:

That any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company subject to the provisions of this act receiving property for transportation from a point in one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to a point in another State, Territory, District of Columbia, or from any point in the United States to a point in an adjacent foreign country shall issue a receipt or bill of lading therefor, and shall be liable to the lawful holder thereof for any loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any common carrier, railroad, or transportation company to which such property may be delivered or over whose line or lines such property may pass within the United States or within an adjacent foreign country when transported on a through bill of lading, and no contract, receipt, rule, regulation, or other limitation of any character whatsoever shall exempt such common carrier, railroad, or transportation company from the liability hereby imposed.

It occurred to me the gentleman's amendment has relevancy to this section, which is section 20 of the interstate-commerce act, more than to the pending bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order. In the case of the M. K. T. against Harriman Bros., and in the case of the Adams Express Co. against Croninger, both of which were decisions by the United States Supreme Court, the provisions to which the gentleman refers are held not to forbid contracts which limit the amount of liability or which specify the giving of notice as a condition precedent to recovery; that they do not refer to that in any way; that they simply refer to the question of actual liability where the issue was up on its merits. The United States Supreme Court therefore has practically nullified any effect of those provisions which would tend to cover the matters referred to in my amendment. Now, the State courts of my State have held that the various matters that I have sought to have covered by this amendment are invalid and unreasonable, and yet since the enactment of the Federal control act, under which we are operating now, I understand a great many courts have held these special contract provisions and limitations valid. Now, the bill we have under consideration and the particular clause or paragraph which I undertake to have amended says that—

Actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any action at law or suit in equity against the carrier no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government.

This brings up the exact question we have under discussion, and that is whether or not certain things that are being plead as defenses in the courts of our country under Federal control shall be valid and effective. I am seeking by virtue of this amendment to bring these specific items under the terms of this general provision of the bill, and this general provision refers to the defenses that are offered in suits for damages. Now, my amendment provides that in live-stock shipment suits for damages the man who is making the shipment shall have the right to bring a suit, and that certain things shall not be defenses. These come strictly under the general terms of the second provision of this act on page 2, and are therefore germane. The general provision of the bill is all inclusive and includes the very specific items which I seek to cover by my amendment.

Therefore I do not see how in the world the amendment could be held other than germane to the provisions of the bill that is presented here. Further, I do not see how anyone can have objection to the amendment, because it is simply protecting the shipper in his rights, the same as he would have been protected and was protected prior to the taking over of these carriers by the Federal Government.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. VENABLE. All provisions, as I understand it, in a bill of lading or contract for carriage that are either unreasonable or contrary to sound public policy are void. Now, if the provisions in these bills of lading are not unreasonable and not contrary to sound public policy, it seems to me that both the railroad and the shipper should have the right to make that kind of a contract if they desire. If they are unreasonable or contrary to public policy, they are void as a matter of law.

Now, the gentleman states that some courts have been deciding unreasonable provisions to be reasonable. That may be true. Courts often decide things wrongly, nisi prius courts, but is it not within the power of those people to take those contracts to the higher courts? Does the gentleman think anything we have passed here in the Federal railroad act would in any wise change the rule that a thing which is unreasonable or against public policy is void?

Mr. JONES of Texas. In answer to the gentleman's question, I think Congress is just as qualified to determine what is unreasonable as is a court. The courts have been undertaking to determine what is reasonable and what is not. And I submit that when a live-stock shipper has a long yellow contract, about a yard long, and in some instances almost as long as a well rope, shoved under his nose when a shipment is just starting, with a lot of provisions that he shall give notice within one day after shipment of the cattle, it is unreasonable, and yet certain courts have decided that such provisions are reasonable.

Mr. VENABLE. What is the style of the case?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I can not give the specific case other than the two cited before, but I can give two cases, for instance——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that the gentleman from Texas is not now discussing the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I was answering the gentleman's question, and I beg the Chair's pardon for being temporarily diverted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. It seems to the Chair that the provisions of the bill cited by the gentleman from Texas are very broad and might properly include the admissibility of evidence as written in the two amendments submitted by him. And therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 641, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the bill just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BELL, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for two weeks on account of official business in connection with the Joint Postal Commission.

BRIDGE ACROSS MINNESOTA RIVER.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill H. R. 9091 be taken from the Speaker's table and the House agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9091) granting the consent of the Congress to the county of Hennepin to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Minnesota River.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DENISON. To ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COMMUNICATION FROM POSTMASTER GENERAL—REFORM IN CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a communication to the Speaker of the House from the Postmaster General in answer to the House resolution passed a few days ago as to first, second, and third class post offices.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the communication from the Postmaster General be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DENISON. Reserving the right to object, to whom is the communication addressed?

Mr. KITCHIN. To the Speaker of the House, in answer to a resolution of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the communication referred to:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., September 24, 1919.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of House resolution 270, directing the Postmaster General to transmit to the House of Representatives certain facts in connection with the vacancies occurring in the position of postmaster at offices of the first, second, and third classes, the list of such vacancies certified by the Postmaster General to the Civil Service Commission, the list of certifications of the result of examinations held to fill such vacancies by the Civil Service Commission, a list of names and the offices to be filled submitted by the Postmaster General to the President, in accordance with the Executive order of March 31, 1917, and other matters in connection with the appointment of postmasters at such offices.

The position of postmaster at offices of the first, second, and third classes is not within the classified civil service, and the civil-service rules and regulations do not apply to such appointments, consequently the selection of persons for nominations to fill vacancies therein is strictly an Executive function, and it is not within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, House of Representatives, to inquire into such nominations. If the recommendation of the Postmaster General, made (with the approval of the President) in 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918, that these positions be by law covered under the classified service, had been followed, the committee would now have full jurisdiction in the premises. But, notwithstanding these repeated recommendations, earnestly insisted upon, no action has been taken, and as the President desired that these positions be as far removed from partisan politics as possible, he has taken all action within his power to take. May I not again urge that action be taken to place these positions regularly under the classified service.

These nominations are made by the President, in accordance with the Executive order of March 31, 1917, which reads as follows:

"Hereafter when a vacancy occurs in the position of postmaster of any office of the first, second, or third class as the result of death, resignation, removal, or, on the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster General, approved by the Postmaster General, to the effect that the efficiency or needs of the service requires that a change shall be made, the Postmaster General shall certify the fact to the Civil Service Commission, which shall forthwith hold an open competitive examination to test the fitness of applicants to fill such vacancy, and when such examination has been held and the papers in connection therewith have been rated, the said commission shall certify the result thereof to the Postmaster General, who shall submit to the President the name of the highest qualified eligible for appointment to fill such vacancy, unless it is established that the character or residence of such applicant disqualifies him for appointment. No person who has passed his sixty-fifth birthday shall be given the examination herein provided for."

This order simply provides a means by and through which the President secures information for his own guidance in selecting suitable persons for nomination to the Senate.

At the request of the President, the Civil Service Commission holds examinations and rates the papers and certifies the register of eligibles to this department for the consideration of the President, this being the only connection the Civil Service Commission has with these appointments.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, House of Representatives would have no jurisdiction in this matter, which is purely an Executive function, the Postmaster General will gladly furnish the information in the utmost detail just as requested by the resolution, so that the facts which have been so grossly misrepresented may be known to the public. To furnish the detailed information required by the resolution will, however, require an immense amount of work, which will take the limited number of clerks that can be assigned to same several weeks to complete.

The records of the department since the Executive order of March 31, 1917, was issued by the President show the following facts:

Number of nominations from eligible register, 1,267.

Number of nominations of first eligible, 1,188, or 93.7 per cent.

Number of nominations of other than first eligible because of death or refusal of first eligible to accept, 26, or 2 per cent.

Number of cases where other than first eligible was nominated because of character or residence of No. 1, 35, or 2.8 per cent.

Number of nominations of other than first eligible for various reasons, such as health of No. 1—tuberculosis, skin disease, etc.—18, or 1.5 per cent.

Number of cases still in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, 466.

Number of cases before the President for consideration awaiting determination of the application of the act of July 11, 1919, 35.

Number of cases certified by the Civil Service Commission but still under consideration by the department, 285.

These figures show conclusively that the charges so frequently made that the Postmaster General is violating the Executive order of March 31, 1917, are unfair, unjust, and without foundation of fact. In this connection may I assert with as much emphasis as possible that in no case has the Postmaster General or the First Assistant Postmaster General, under whose immediate supervision these cases are handled, by letter or by word spoken, attempted to control or influence the action of the Civil Service Commission in the selection of any individual to fill any vacancy occurring in one of these positions, but have at all times observed the Executive order in letter and in spirit.

At the time the resolution was pending before the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, House of Representatives, used in the discussion a letter addressed to him by the Acting Postmaster General on August 23, 1919, in reference to the case at Newark, N. J. While certain paragraphs of this letter were read, other paragraphs were not, so the fact was not placed in the record that the highest eligible certified to the Post Office Department by the Civil Service Commission for appointment at Newark was a former postmaster who, during his term of office, was recommended for removal by two post-office inspectors for pernicious political activity, which recommendation had the approval of the chief inspector of this department; also that other facts in connection with the ratings made the department hesitate to submit to the President for appointment the name of the highest eligible. This will be disclosed by the full text of the letter, which is as follows:

"Hon. FREDERICK R. LEHLBACH,
"Chairman Committee on Reform in the Civil Service,
"House of Representatives.

"MY DEAR MR. LEHLBACH: In reply to your letter of the 20th instant requesting certain information for the committee relative to the appointment of a postmaster for Newark, N. J., I inclose, in accordance with your request, a copy of the Executive order of March 31, 1917, which provides for examinations to determine the fitness of applicants for appointment at presidential offices; also that the highest eligible shall be appointed unless disqualified by character or residence.

"The vacancy in the office of Newark, N. J., occurred when the postmaster died on May 1, 1918. The four-year term for which he was appointed would expire on January 25, 1920.

"Newark is an office of the first class, and the position of postmaster is not in the classified civil service, and the civil-service laws and regulations do not apply or have anything to do with the appointment of a postmaster at an office of this size. The Civil Service Commission at the request of the department simply conducts an examination to determine the fitness of the various applicants, and the order providing for the examination was issued with a view to making these appointments strictly on the basis of merit.

"The commission was requested on November 18, 1918, to hold an examination for postmaster at Newark, and the list of eligibles was received from the commission on February 17, 1919, the eligibles and their ratings being as follows:

Frank J. Bock	75.00
Charles A. Entemann	74.40
Elwood S. Armitage	74.00
John F. Sinnott, jr	70.60

"It will be observed that Mr. Frank J. Bock was certified as the highest eligible. Mr. Bock was formerly postmaster at Newark, and during the latter part of his term his removal was recommended by two post-office inspectors for undue political activity, and the recommendation was approved by the chief inspector. In accordance with the practice of the department in vogue at that time this report was referred to the Civil Service Commission for review, and was returned by the commission with the statement that the postmaster's political activity had not been of such a nature as to warrant his removal. While the department did not agree with the findings of the commission, it permitted Mr. Bock to serve the remainder of his term. At a time when the department is attempting to appoint persons to these positions solely on the basis of merit, and to secure the best qualified persons for appointment, it is not felt that a postmaster whose political actions were such as to merit a recommendation by two post-office inspectors for his removal on the ground of improper political activity, should be appointed postmaster. It is also contended by the First Assistant Postmaster General that the ratings given Mr. Bock and Mr. Entemann do not accord with the papers on file in this case. Mr. Bock has a business rating of 75, which seems to have been given him on the ground that he was formerly postmaster and without any attempt to establish whether he personally discharged the duties of his position at that time or whether the condition of the Newark post office was due to any work on his part. At the same time Mr. Charles A. Entemann, who has been a post-office inspector for 24 years and is capable and efficient, was given a business rating by the commission of only 75, notwithstanding the fact that he was Mr. Bock's superior officer and had charge of the post offices of the district in which Newark is located. In the judgment of the First Assistant Postmaster General these ratings can not be reconciled, and when attempting to secure the most competent person for the position of postmaster to appoint one whose removal was recommended while postmaster and who, in the judgment of the department, is not entitled to the highest rating would be to defeat the purposes for which the Executive order was issued. This matter has been taken up by the First Assistant Postmaster General in personal discussions with the commission, but they have adhered to their original ratings.

"In the second paragraph of your letter you refer to the Executive order 'extending civil-service regulations to the officer of postmasters of the first class,' and I wish to advise you that under the law postmasters at offices of the first, second, and third classes must be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and that they can not, therefore, be placed in the classified civil service by Executive order, and, as stated above, these positions are not in the classified civil service.

"I appreciate very much your affording me an opportunity to furnish you the facts in this case.

"Very sincerely,

"J. C. KOONS,
"Acting Postmaster General."

The information in detail requested by the resolution will be compiled at the earliest possible date and transmitted to the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a brief letter from a farmer at Ulysses, Nebr., bearing on the recent reduction in the price of hogs and corn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from a farmer in Nebraska relative to the price of hogs and corn. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

ULYSSES, NEBR., September 14, 1919.

Hon. M. O. McLAUGHLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Farmers in this vicinity have been wondering since the H. C. L. agitation has been started what is to be the policy of the Government toward the man who produces the food. The price of the farmer's produce has fallen so greatly since about August 1 that you hear many words of dissatisfaction from this class of people.

The price of corn has declined from $2.08 per bushel to $1.32 at Omaha, but we find that corn meal is still 7 cents per pound, or $3.92 per bushel.

In 1918 I raised on 108 acres of ground 622 bushels of corn, and as I was compelled to move last fall I paid 15 cents per bushel for what I hired husked.

Part of the ground on which this corn was raised being rented, I paid a share of it, so you see I have not much left; and now, with the price steadily declining (7 cents Friday and 13 Saturday), it would seem better for a farmer to have been a "conscientious objector," for they, at least, received pay and honorable discharge, while all the farmer gets is work and advice upon how to produce more so that the rest of the country can live more cheaply.

Oats follows the lead of corn, although more slowly, being down now about 18 cents per bushel.

Has oatmeal declined any?

Have you noticed the price of hogs lately?

Do I buy ham cheaper than I did? You know the answer.

A friend of mine who has always raised from 200 to 400 hogs each year told me recently that if the Government was going to allow the farmer to be robbed in that manner he was going to quit. He only intends to raise enough for his own use.

As far as I am concerned, I have not one on my farm at present, but will possibly raise enough for family use.

Our wheat this year will average not over 12 bushels per acre, and I think hardly that.

Last year was not nearly so good, and the year before all winter wheat was killed. Yet the Food Administration claimed they were being very good to the farmer when they cut the price of his wheat from $3.60 to $2.20 per bushel in Chicago. Was the price of cotton lowered or even so?

When the administration guaranteed the price of wheat for 1919 they informed the farmer he was being favored; but the Food Administration, at the last report I saw of Julius Barnes, had a profit of, I think, $23,000,000.

The farmer was also given to understand that for each month wheat was held there would be a corresponding increase in price, but it seems that this has been forgotten.

He is also denied a free market.

Corn in this vicinity this year will make a short half crop. Laboring men are asking 10 and 12 cents per bushel, with board, for husking.

What will become of the farmer? When he buys a gang plow he pays $120, and for a binder $260, with no drop in sight. It costs $1.20 to have a gang plow sharpened. Wages were as much as $7 per day and board for plowing corn. I heard one young fellow refuse $1 per hour and board for corn plowing. Was he a profiteer?

Is it right that the farmer should raise a crop (pardon, one-half crop here) with this kind of labor ($5 to $7) and then sell at prices where they are now going or have already gone?

I think, from all appearances, that the farmer, unless he is given a little consideration, will at last awaken to what he may expect, and the only remedy will be to organize. He can plainly see what this has done for the railroad men, and he must follow suit. He must get some money with which to pay his taxes on the administration bill for the Army of $900,000,000, which seems necessary, as the league of nations will insure peace (?).

Briefly, the farmers here think the administration is forcing these prices down. They know that everything else is going up, and they would like fair play. Don't you think they should have it?

Many thanks for your vote and support on the repeal of daylight saving.

Will you please show this letter to Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, for whom I have admiration, and I also believe he is on the Agricultural Committee?

Yours, truly, BURR R. STROMAN.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill S. 6401. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee relating to the remarks of the secretary of the American Federation of Labor on the right to transmit property.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we could not hear what "the matter indicated" was.

Mr. STEELE. The "matter indicated" was this: The secretary of the American Federation of Labor, in his statement on the Plumb plan before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in expressing his views upon the subject of what he called "ideal democracy," said he saw no reason at all why a parent should be permitted to transmit his property to his children. It is an example of the socialistic tendency which is now abroad in the country, and particularly in line with what I see in the evening papers, where Mr. Trotski announces that the red campaign is to be prosecuted in England and America. It is a statement that is simply an illustration of the socialistic tendency that I feel ought to be placed in the RECORD at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is this document in favor of this so-called Plumb plan?

Mr. STEELE. No. It is an illustration of the socialistic tendency that I referred to.

Mr. BLANTON. Does it speak against the Plumb plan?

Mr. STEELE. No; it does not.

Mr. BLANTON. If it does not, I do not think that any such bunk as the Plumb plan should go into the RECORD, and therefore I object.

Mr. STEELE. It does not deal with that at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CANNON. Is it a request to strike out something from the RECORD?

Mr. STEELE. No; it is to insert something.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House resolution 200, a resolution introduced by me on the subject of the aerial mail service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on House resolution 200. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the American soldier.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the American soldier. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an account of the world's shipping from June 30, 1914, according to Lloyd's Register returns, and also the world's shipping June 30, 1919, according to Lloyd's Register. I ask also permission to put this in as a public document.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by publishing a table showing the world's shipping on June 30, 1914, and June 30, 1919. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, how many copies are to be printed as a public document?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not know, but I think I should have about 2,000 copies for the use of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman had it before the Committee on Printing?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No; I have not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman also asks unanimous consent to have certain tables concerning the world's shipping of June 30, 1914, and June 30, 1919, printed as a document. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2910. SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 25, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, lead us by Thy grace and wisdom unto the duties of this day. With the far-seeing vision of men who have come to their duty from the place of God and who are performing their tasks under the influence and inspiration of Thy holy Spirit, may we to-day do that which is well pleasing in Thy sight, and add something to the total of the uplift of mankind and the advancement of the interests of all the people of this country. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. NELSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MEAT PACKERS' PROFITS INVESTIGATION.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, yesterday morning when the Vice President laid before the Senate the reply of the Federal Trade Commission to a resolution of the Senate asking for information I asked that the communication and also the exhibits accompanying it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I find upon an examination of the RECORD that the communication was printed in the RECORD, but the exhibits were not printed. The exhibits, I understand, in this case contain most of the meat of the coconut, and since they were ordered printed yesterday I ask that the three exhibits attached to the communication of the Federal Trade Commission be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair desires to say to the Senator from Nebraska that he does not believe the RECORD can come out to-morrow if they print those exhibits in it.

Mr. NORRIS subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning I asked and obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the exhibits that were attached to the Federal Trade Commission's report that came in yesterday and that were omitted from the RECORD. Upon consultation with several Senators, it is deemed best that this matter be published as a Senate document instead of being printed in the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have the report and the exhibits printed as a Senate document, and if that is granted I shall withdraw my former request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). If there be no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. I now withdraw the request I made this morning to have the matter printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order for the printing in the RECORD is rescinded.

Humphreys, Va., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that tomorrow, at some convenient time when I can get recognition, I shall address the Senate upon the German treaty.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask unanimous consent to move that the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, be taken up in order that the point of order made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] may be disposed of. That point of order was pending when the Senate went into executive session day before yesterday. I have no objection to its being disposed of, and after it is disposed of I want to move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 102 on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut has preferred a unanimous-consent request. The Chair believes that the point of order is now before the Senate, that it is a question of the very highest moment to determine what is the decision of the Senate with reference to the point of order made by the Senator from Wisconsin. Unless there is an objection, the Chair will state the question. Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the decision of the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I shall take only a moment in recalling to the Senate just what is the point of order that was discussed the other day.

This bill it is admitted was never considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is admitted that there was never any vote in that committee upon the bill. It is admitted that the bill came before the Senate upon an individual poll of Senators constituting a majority of the committee. The point of order made is that the bill is improperly upon the calendar, is improperly before the Senate, and in fact is still before the committee, and the decision of the Chair ruling to the contrary is appealed from. It does not seem that there ought to be any question about this proposition. Jefferson's Manual is explicit in that a committee can not act except when they meet and assemble together and vote.

I want especially to call the attention of the minority, who the other day voted to sustain the ruling, as to the position they will be in in the future in regard to legislation if the ruling should be sustained. If the ruling is sustained any Senator who is a member of a committee and chose to do it could send a bill to the Secretary's desk purporting to be the act of the committee without even a poll of the members of the committee and get the bill upon the calendar, and the Senate would be compelled to act upon it as if it was properly upon the calendar. I was amazed, Mr. President, at the vote upon the other side upon the proposition.

Is it possible that the Senate of the United States is to make a precedent now that a bill referred to a committee need never be considered by that committee, that the minority members of the committee shall not have the right to meet in the committee and discuss it and deliberate upon it and propose amendments to it? If the majority members of a committee, in order to cut off the right of the minority, prefer to take the course of merely going to majority members and getting their consent to the reporting of a bill, what protection has the minority? No protection whatever. It is absolutely destructive of the right of individual Senators. It is absolutely destructive of the right of members of committees.

Mr. President, the difficulty of securing quorums of committees came up not many years ago, and an amendment to the rules was adopted at the suggestion of the then Senator from Arkansas, Mr. Clarke. There was a very long debate upon the adoption of that amendment to the rules, and it was admitted by every Senator that it was absolutely necessary to meet in committee in order to give validity to a report of a committee. It was provided that a quorum might consist of one-third of the membership of any committee if the committee so voted, but, in order to protect the rights of the minority, it was also provided that in that event a bill could not be reported unless the report was concurred in by a majority of the full committee; in other words, it was provided that while one-third of the membership of the committee might constitute a quorum, a majority of such a quorum could not report a bill, but that such report required a majority of one-fourth of the entire membership of the committee. That rule was adopted with that understanding.

But what have we before us now? We have now a proposition proposed to be sustained by the minority that no meeting of a committee is necessary at all; that instead of one-third of the committee being necessary to constitute a quorum, it is not necessary to have anyone present in the committee room; that it is not even necessary to hold a meeting of the committee in order to give validity to a report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator said "a majority of one-fourth." The Senator means, I assume, a majority of one-half.

Mr. LENROOT. A majority of one-half of a majority, constituting at least one-fourth of the entire membership of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question, merely for the purpose of having his own view upon a certain phase of the case?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree with the Senator entirely that a proposed report signed by members outside of the committee room is not the action of the committee in law or in fact; but suppose that such a report is presented in that form carrying the signatures of a majority of all of the committee, and the Senate understands that it comes in that form; and with that understanding, without objection upon the part of a single Member of the Senate, the matter is considered by the Senate, is amended and passes through the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, is again discussed and amended in the Senate, and ultimately reaches the point of a final vote in the Senate, can any Senator at that time raise the objection that the bill has not been considered by the committee and force it back to committee? In other words, can all of the consideration and action by the Senate be destroyed through all of these several stages by a mere objection at the very point when the bill comes up for a final vote? In other words, is there such a thing as a waiver of the rule by the action of the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am very glad to answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota. I say there is and can be no waiver of the rule of the Senate under the rules of the Senate. That has been held very recently by the Vice President in a case that he well remembers, the point being raised by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] as to whether a point of order could be made after the Senate had proceeded with the consideration of a bill. The House rule is to the contrary, but the Senate rule expressly providing that a point of order may be made at any stage of the proceedings, the Chair very properly held that the point of order could be made at any time.

Mr. McLEAN rose.

Mr. LENROOT. Just a moment. I should like to finish my reply to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

The point here is that the Senate has no jurisdiction of this bill. It is exactly analogous to a case in the civil courts where at any time, even after a decree is entered, if it develops that the court has not jurisdiction, no matter how far the proceeding has gone, it all must fall, of course. That is exactly the principle applied to this case. But even though it were otherwise, Mr. President, if a bill comes to the Senate, presumably in regular form, appearing upon the calendar in regular form, so that Senators have the right to believe that the committee to whom that bill was referred has acted upon it in a regular way, if later in the proceedings it develops for the first time, and then comes to the knowledge of the Senate for the first time, that that bill has never been acted on by the committee, surely it can not be said that there is any waiver in that case. That is exactly the situation with reference to this bill.

On the last day the bill was considered, at the very conclusion of its consideration, it developed for the first time that there had never been a meeting of the committee; it was then stated by members of the committee that the bill had been reported upon a poll of the committee; and I want to say to the Senate that at that time I stated, and there were other Senators who stated—the Senate had just concluded the consideration of the bill and it was going over—that we proposed to make the point of order; and I made the point of order at the first opportunity when the bill again came up.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. ASHURST addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield first to the Senator from Washington,

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin claim that the Senate would not have jurisdiction to consider and to act upon a bill without referring it to a committee?

Mr. LENROOT. It could only do so by unanimous consent. The Senate can do anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We can not change the rules of the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. The rules may be suspended by unanimous consent.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That may be done, although there is a provision that notice must be previously given before the rules can be suspended. Does the Senator from Wisconsin claim that the Senate could not by a majority vote recommit a bill to a committee?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senate could do that if the bill were before the Senate; but the point is that this bill is not before the Senate.

It happens to be physically in possession of the Secretary of the Senate; it happens to be placed upon the calendar, the Secretary presuming, of course, that it was reported and that the report was the report of the committee. Now, however, it develops that the committee had never considered the bill; that it had never voted to report it; that it had never authorized the chairman to make a report. The bill is physically here, but it is not within the jurisdiction of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin another question right here?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose, however, that without reference to a point of order being raised, or, if it were raised, that a bare majority of the Senate should vote that the bill was properly before the Senate notwithstanding the fact recited by the Senator from Wisconsin, and the bill should finally be passed by the Senate and by the other House, does the Senator from Wisconsin claim that it then would not be a valid law?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then it would naturally follow that a bill may be taken possession of by the Senate and finally disposed of by the Senate notwithstanding the fact that the committee did not act on it in committee?

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senate wishes to violate its rules, yes. The Senator, of course, is very familiar with the well-settled principle of law that it is the final act of the legislative body upon a bill that determines its validity. Every rule might be violated; a bill might not be in possession of the Senate at all; and yet, if the Senate acted upon that bill and sent it over to the House, although it might have been before the committee and never have come properly before the Senate, and the House concurred in it and the President signed it, it would be a valid law, because the courts will never inquire into the parliamentary stages preceding the passage of a bill. I now yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I beg the Senator's pardon. I desired to occupy five or six minutes, and I will not interrupt the Senator now.

Mr. LENROOT. I will conclude in just a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator right here does not the conclusion of the Senator's own argument mean that, even though the rule has been violated so far as the report by the committee is concerned, the Senate may lawfully get hold of the bill again and pass it, and that it will be valid when it is passed only because it was lawfully before the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senate can break every rule if it chooses that it has enacted for the conduct of its proceedings. It need not refer a bill to a committee at all, although the rule expressly provides that it shall; and if the Senate should refuse to do that and pass the bill it would be a valid law, of course; but we are acting under the rules of this body, and under the rules of this body this bill is not before the Senate, is not within the jurisdiction of the Senate, and can not be within the jurisdiction of the Senate without violating the rules of the Senate. That is the point. Now, I wish to repeat——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What becomes of the amendments the Senate put on this bill?

Mr. LENROOT. The action of the Senate, if the point of order is sustained, is of no avail whatever, any more than the action of a court upon a case not within its jurisdiction has any validity.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a further question in that connection?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Do I understand the Senator to assert that, the announcement having been made in the Senate some days ago that this bill had been reported by a poll and without a formal meeting of the committee, and the Senate having considered the bill for several days and amended it and no point of order up until that time having been made, if the point of order be now made and sustained that the Senate has no jurisdiction of the bill, that such action ipso facto reverses the action of the Senate on the amendments heretofore agreed to? Does the Senator assert that sustaining the point of order now affects the proceedings of the Senate in relation to the amendments?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course it does; there can be no doubt as to that proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will pardon me, there is not only doubt about it in the minds of some of us, including myself, but, in my opinion, his proposition can not be maintained either in sound reason or good argument.

The Senator will concede that the Senate might have proceeded to the consideration of this bill by unanimous consent, it being known to the Senate and announced on the floor that the report had been made by poll rather than after a formal meeting of the committee. The Senate having acted upon the matter, if the bill goes back to the committee now it goes with the amendments adopted by the committee, unless the Senate by formal action reconsiders the amendments heretofore adopted.

The Senator, in making his statement of the facts relating to this case, did not state all of the facts which, I believe, are germane to a fair consideration of the point of order; and if he will pardon me for supplementing his statement in his time, I will do so. The facts are that this bill was referred to the committee on August 1, 1919; on August 15, 1919, it was reported without amendment, according to the record. It appears to be true that the committee held no formal meeting, but that a majority of the committee, pursuing a custom which has obtained in the Senate for many years, agreed to the report by the process that we know as a poll of the committee, and subsequently the Senate, on motion, proceeded to the consideration of the bill. The statement was made during the course of the debate on the bill repeatedly that no formal meeting of the committee had been had, but that the report had been made as a result of a poll. Amendments were proposed and agreed to. In the meantime the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], in order to obviate that difficulty, called a formal meeting of the committee. He took extraordinary precaution to protect the rights of members of the committee and of the committee itself by writing to each member of the committee, inclosing a copy of the bill, and stating that a meeting of the committee would be held to consider the bill.

After he had done that, a meeting of the committee was held, and no action was taken by the committee reversing the action that had theretofore been taken by the process of a poll of the committee. When the Senate was about ready to vote on the passage of the bill, the Senator from Wisconsin made the point of order that the bill had not been properly reported, and the Chair overruled that point of order, giving as his reason the opinion, as I understood the then occupant of the chair, that a point of order was not the proper procedure in such cases; that under the practice of the Senate the proper procedure when a committee exceeds its jurisdiction with reference to a bill or a report is to move to recommit the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. And the correctness of that ruling he supported by reference to the amendment that was adopted by the Senate some time ago with respect to conference reports which did not embrace the reports of standing committees. That, I understand, is the true history of the case. Further than that, an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair, and a motion was made to lay that appeal on the table, and that motion was lost by a vote of 35 to 37.

If the Senator will pardon me for further trespassing——

Mr. LENROOT. If I may just say——

Mr. ROBINSON. I concede the Senator's right to proceed, but ask that he yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not yield further for the moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I, of course, will resume my seat.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. I want to reply just at that point.

The Senator speaks of the report of a conference committee, and the change in the rules with reference to a point of order being made to that. In that case the conference committee always had jurisdiction to make the report. In every case the committee did act——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point for a moment?

Mr. LENROOT. Just let me finish this statement. The only question was whether that conference committee, acting as a committee properly, had exceeded its authority; and the rule was made that where they had exceeded their authority a point of order might lie. In this case, however, the committee has not acted at all. There is no report of the committee. The distinction is very clear.

Now, I yield further.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator please inform the Senate when he discovered the startling fact that a committee had not considered this bill? Did he discover it at the moment he made the point of order, or did he wait until he saw that the bill was about to be passed, and then, as a last and desperate resort, rush to this point a month after the bill had been considered in the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. There is no warrant whatever for any such reflection upon the part of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I intended none.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will examine the RECORD he will find when this information first came before the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. No; but let the Senator answer the question.

Mr. LENROOT. I will answer the question—that the RECORD will show that this information first came to the Senate upon the last day when it was considered prior to my making the point of order, and I only took such time as was required to look up the parliamentary situation, and I stated here to other Senators that I intended to make the point of order. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] at the same time said that he intended to make the point of order. If there could be a question of waiver, there is no waiver in this case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must call the attention of the Senator from Arizona to the fact that he was acting as Presiding Officer when he made the ruling.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator thanks the Chair, and desires to make an observation, if the Senator will permit.

Mr. LENROOT. I was about to yield to the Senator from Arkansas first, but I will yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no pride of opinion on this question. I do not pretend to be more familiar with the rules of the Senate than the average Senator; but, happening to be called to the chair, the point of order was made by the Senator from Wisconsin, who now displays so much heat over the matter. I repeat I have no pride of opinion whatever.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield? I have no heat, except as to the reflection which the Senator from Arizona was attempting to cast upon me.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator thinks that a reflection, I will, of course, here publicly say that I intended no reflection, except that in my country the police courts would not permit such trifling; and I do not mean, now, that the Senator has trifled. What I mean is this: That where a case has been pending for a month and important proceedings have been had, the point comes too late. But, waiving that question, because our rules say that the point can be made at any time, this mattr can be settled easily, in my judgment, and this will address itself to the mind of any lawyer. There is not a lawyer in this Chamber but that will see the force of this suggestion upon which the Chair predicated the ruling and which has precipitated all of this trouble.

I assert here that for a hundred years when conferees exceeded their jurisdiction the remedy was to move to recommit. The so-called Curtis amendment to the rules—a very good amendment, too—was adopted in the Sixty-fifth Congress. It is now subdivision 2 of Rule XXVII. That rule provided that—

> Conferees shall not insert in their report matter not committed to them by either House, nor shall they strike from the bill matter agreed to by both Houses. If new matter is inserted in the report, or if matter which was agreed to by both Houses is stricken from the bill, a point of order may be made against the report.

For a hundred years points of order would not lie against conference reports where the conferees exceeded their jurisdiction. For a hundred years points of order would not lie against the reports of standing committees when they exceeded their jurisdiction and reported back a bill without a quorum of the committee considering the bill. For a hundred years the method of procedure was to move to recommit. But the Senate took up the subject of reports of conference committees, and said that hereafter, as to the reports of conference committees, whenever the conference committees exceeded their jurisdiction the remedy should be by point of order. The Senate did not see fit to deal with the reports of standing committees; and every lawyer who ever tried a case knows that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of the other. If the Senate had intended to apply the rule to standing committees, it would not have selected conference committees and then excluded standing committees. The then occupant of the chair was bound to rule on that question in that way, and, he repeats, has no pride of opinion, no pride of expression; but is the Senate to be trifled with—and I again assert to the Senator from Wisconsin that I mean no reflection—but are we to do useless, idle things? Are we to sit here and gravely discuss a bill for a month, amend the bill, and then find that the committee is master, and not the Senate? The committee is only a creature of the Senate.

I have said this much upon the solicitation of Senators on both sides of the Chamber who are interested in the ruling. I regret the necessity of having said it; but, to my mind, the Chair could have made no other ruling except that one which addressed itself to lawyers.

I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for yielding to me.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not question for a moment that the Senator who made this ruling has used his very best judgment; but let me draw his attention to the distinction that should be made between the case that he speaks of and this case, and I am sure it will readily appeal to him as a lawyer.

Suppose that a bill had been referred to a conference committee and some member of that committee, without the conferees ever meeting or ever considering the bill, undertook to make to the Senate what purported to be a conference report, when it was not a conference report at all. Does the Senator think for a moment that a point of order would not lie against that action?

Mr. ASHURST. Answering the Senator's question, assuming that the conferees have signed a conference report and have never met, a conference report must be signed, and signed by a majority of the conferees. The reports of standing committees, however, are not signed. The record can not be impeached by the mere statement of a Senator. The record of the Secretary shows that a report was made. The bill prima facie stands before the Senate. What does this mean? On the printed Calendar of the Senate for a month is Order of Business No. 126, H. R. 7478, reported by Mr. PAGE from the Committee on Banking and Currency. Is the Senate at all times to suspect that its calendar is an entrapment proceeding; that the Secretary fills up the calendar each morning with matters that are improperly there? If a Senator makes a report, and that report is later to be impeached, and it is to be asserted that he made it without authority, where do we stand? Are we children making mud pies and wasting the country's time and our own, or are we men engaged in serious business of the Republic of the United States? Shall we put the plain, the practical, and the common-sense interpretation upon this rule? I say this with great respect, for the Senator is familiar with the rules of the House, and he has fallen into error, if he will pardon me, on that account. I say this courteously, because I doubt if there be a Member in the other branch of Congress who is more familiar with the rules of the House than is the Senator from Wisconsin; but the Senator must remember that the Senate has never adopted Jefferson's Manual. Possibly the Senate should adopt Jefferson's Manual, but it has not done so, and I do not believe that Jefferson's Manual is referred to in the rules at all, although I do concede that the philosophy of Jefferson's Manual is the underlying philosophy of these rules. Yet just as a statute law repeals the common law the rules of the Senate have repealed Jefferson's Manual wherever they are in express or even implied conflict.

I again thank the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, to bring the illustration of conferees so that it will be exactly like this case the Senator says that the presumption is when a conference report is signed that the conferees have met. That is true; but suppose a conference report is signed by only a majority. One of the conferees does not sign, and when the report is made he gets up in the Senate and states that there never was a meeting of the conferees upon the proposition. The chairman of the conferees gets up and says that that is true, that the conferees never met, but a majority signed the report. Does the Senator think that a point of order would not lie?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again? That question was tested out, not once, but upon numerous occasions in the Senate, where the conferees exceeded their jurisdiction.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, it is not a case of exceeding their authority. It is a case of making a report.

Mr. ASHURST. All right. That has been tested out, since I have been in the Senate, two or three times. I remember upon one distinct occasion a point of order was made against a report——

Mr. LENROOT. Upon what ground?

Mr. ASHURST. Upon the ground that they had inserted matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; but that is not this case. Does not the Senator see that there is a difference between a report where they exceeded their authority and a case where there is no report at all?

Mr. ASHURST. All right. Granting the Senator's position, I again assert that that was not the remedy as to conference reports until the so-called Curtis rule was adopted; and if a point of order was the remedy, why did the Senate adopt the Curtis rule in the Sixty-fifth Congress? Did we again do a vain thing? Could we reasonably make a point of order against a conference report and yet at the same time adopt a rule permitting us to make a point of order against a conference report? Are we to sit here forever spinning all the time and weaving nothing? Are we never to make progress? There was no such proccdurc as a point of order against a conference report until the adoption of the Curtis rule. If so, why did we adopt the Curtis rule?

Mr. LENROOT. It is very easy to explain that. That was a case where they made their report after due consideration, but had exceeded the authority granted to them by the Senate. I thought the distinction was clear to the Senator from Arizona. I am surprised that it is not. But the Senator from Arizona now takes the position that while under the rules a point of order can be made if they exceed their authority, if this ruling be sustained, and we appoint a conference committee, they never would have to meet; all they would have to do would be for a majority of them to sign a report, upon which the conferees would never vote, upon which the member of the minority has never had a chance to participate, and it would be a valid document. It is absurd and preposterous, Mr. President, that a point of order would not lie in a case of that kind.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to make one suggestion. The chairman of the committee is desirous of having the bill recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency. If a motion is made to that effect and carried, why would not that settle the matter for the present? In my opinion, the discussion is to some extent academic. The objection the Senator from Wisconsin makes could have well been made when the bill was reported; but no objection having been made at that time, and the Senate having taken up the bill and considered it and amended it, that is equivalent to unanimous consent. It is a rule in judicial proceedings that ordinarily you must make an objection at the proper time. The proper time to have made the objection, and it would have been a valid one, was when the bill was reported. But after the bill had been placed on the calendar and had been taken up and considered and amended, it seems to me the objection came too late.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The House of Representatives, as Senators are well aware, has a rule providing for reserving points of order, and unless points of order are reserved, objection can not afterwards be made in a case like the present; but there is no rule of the Senate which permits the reserving of points of order; the rule expressly provides that a point of order may be made at any time. If a Senator were compelled to make a point of order when a bill was reported, and there was no knowledge, and could be none, upon the part of any Senator, execept the members of the committee, that they had taken a poll, how can it be said that the Senator has waived his right?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not pretend to be an expert on parliamentary law or the precedents of the Senate, but there is probably no reason why I should not give my opinion upon this question.

It seems to me the question is divided into two parts. In the first place, can a committee act without meeting, simply upon a poll? In the second place, has the point of order been waived?

It would seem, as a matter of plain common sense, that the Senate is entitled to the collective judgment of a committee, which meets, where everyone is entitled to be present and express his opinion. We all know that a man does not give the consideration to a bill when he is approached and asked to consent to its being reported that he gives when he meets with a committee and discusses the measure. What the Senate is entitled to is the judgment of a committee, and I know of no way by which a committee can legally act, unless there is some rule to the contrary, except by meeting and voting upon the report of a bill. That is the universal law as to boards of directors of corporations and as to directors of all kinds of institutions where the law does not provide that they must meet. The implication is that they must meet, be present and vote, and that they can not act as a body unless they do meet. I should say that it would be a very dangerous rule, if committees of the Senate could simply act by the chairmen polling them, and I should think if the point of order were made, certainly when the bill comes into the Senate it would be sent back to the committee.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I am curious to know, then, whether the position of the Senator would take him so far logically that it would strike down the practice of Senators being counted for a quorum? Is that subject to the same objection?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think it is. I do not think Senators can be counted for a quorum if there is an objection made, and I do not think they should be. I think the committee, in order to act, must meet, the same as a board of directors.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator on that particular point?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not true that it is a universal practice that is followed without exception that nobody is counted for a quorum except by unanimous consent, and that any Member may object to another casting a vote in the place of some one else?

Mr. KNOX. That does not touch the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. His proposition, as I understand it, is that in respect to a corporation, and in respect to the Senate, what the stockholders are entitled to and what the Senate is entitled to is a meeting and an exchange of views upon any proposition that is submitted. You can not have an exchange of views if by unanimous consent you let three-fourths of the committee stay away and the other fourth do the business.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the rule. Of course, it can be waived, as the action on this bill can be waived, by unanimous consent. If nobody objected some member could cast somebody else's vote.

Mr. KNOX. That was why I raised the question originally, to get the view of the Senator from Minnesota on that point.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator is right. If the point is made, an absentee could not be counted, of course. I had supposed that to be the practice, because in the committees on which I have served members have been asked if there was any objection to the counting of absentees for a quorum. But, of course, that does not prevent bills being reported upon a poll of the committees having them in charge, and I presume that will always be done, more or less. However, I should say the point of order could be made to it.

The next question, which is a different question, is whether the point of order must be made before the bill is considered in the Senate. As the object of a committee meeting to consider a bill is to give the Senate its opinion, and an opinion that is worth something—because we all know every Senator can not investigate fully every bill—it would see that the Senate is just exactly as much entitled to the opinion of the committee after it has been discussing the bill for one day, or one hour, or 10 minutes, as it was before; and it would seem, until the bill had been passed, while it is in its preliminary stages, as though the point of order might be made and the bill sent back to the committee. Of course, in this I may be mistaken; but it would seem to me that that would be the practical construction to be placed upon the rule.

Of course, the object of having the opinion of the committee is to benefit the Senate. The fact that some one arose to discuss the bill a few moments would not make it any less necessary that the committee give the bill its attention.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator will agree that the Senate, by a majority vote, can discharge a committee and proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senate can discharge a committee and relieve it of consideration of a bill that has not been reported on by the committee, can not the Senate, also, by a motion, proceed to the consideration of a bill that has not been reported by the committee at all? In this case this bill has not been reported, we will say, by the committee. We all agree that it is a primary law that the committee must act as a committee, and not through its individual members. Therefore there has been no report of the committee. But, as I understand this case, the Senate, by a vote, a positive vote, proceeded to take up this bill and to discuss it and act on it. When the Senate, by its own action, votes to consider any bill that is improperly reported to it, is it not in exactly the same position as though it had voted to take up a bill which had not been reported at all, and to take it away from the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to make this further statement, that the Senate three times took up this bill, and twice took it up after the Senate had received information from the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency as to the manner of the report. The present proposition is not to avoid returning it to the committee but simply to take up the bill.

The chairman of the committee has asked unanimous consent to send it back to the committee, and that has been refused, so the question now is, Where is the bill? If it is in the Senate, we can take it up. We do not want to keep it here. The chairman of the committee wants to take it back to his committee. If it is not in the Senate, where is it?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I will try to answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. The rules, as I understand, provide that a committee may be discharged and the Senate may call for a bill and act on it. Therefore, that is a proceeding authorized by the rules of the Senate. The Senate may at any time, of course, suspend a rule. But I take it that the point of order that a committee has not properly reported a bill may be made at any stage before the bill becomes a law. After the bill becomes a law, of course, it is too late.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him this question? If the point of order is made and the bill goes back into the hands of the committee, without the Senate sending it there, after the Senate had accepted the bill from the committee and acted upon it and amended it, can the bill get back to the committee without action now by the Senate?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think so. If I should take a bill from the table of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and report it to the Senate, it would not put the bill in the Senate so that it would be here. If a point of order were made, it would go back to the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it go back with any amendment that might have been made, or as it was originally?

Mr. KELLOGG. I should think it would go without the amendments, because the amendments have only provisionally been adopted. For instance, in the case of the telephone bill last year, it was reported by the committee, a point of order was made, and it was sent back to the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question for the purpose of determining to what extent his reasoning would carry him? Suppose a House bill has come before the Senate, just as it has come before the Senate here, upon a signed, purported statement of a committee, which is not a report at all. The Senate acts upon it, without objection, upon motion to take it up, and the Senate amends the bill. It goes back to the House, is acted upon by the House, comes back to the Senate, the Senate disagrees to the amendments that are made by the House, and a committee of conference is appointed. Does the Senator from Minnesota think that we could still raise the point of order that all those steps have been improper, and that the bill has not been acted upon by the Senate, or the House, either, and that it must go back to the committee?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I do not.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I want to restate the facts connected with the history of the report on this bill. I undertook to do that a few moments ago. The clerk at my request has prepared a statement, to which I want to call the attention of the Senate.

On August 1, 1919, this bill came to the Senate from the House, was read twice and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

On August 15, 1919, Mr. PAGE, the vice-chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported the bill to the Senate, submitting at the time a report, No. 148, which is embraced in three printed pages.

It has since been revealed that the bill was reported upon a poll of the committee, and the names of nine Senators appear upon the title page of the bill, namely, Senators HITCHCOCK, PAGE, FLETCHER, GRONNA, FRELINGHUYSEN, McLEAN, HENDERSON, DAVID I. WALSH, and NEWBERRY. If 9 out of 16 members of a committee sign a report on a bill and a formal meeting is afterward held and the report adhered to it must be presumed that the report is valid.

The committee is composed of 16 members. Therefore the Senators signing the bill constitute not only a majority of a majority, but more than a majority of the entire membership of the committee.

September 12, 1919, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, was read in full, and amendments were suggested.

September 15, 1919, the bill was again considered as in Committee of the Whole and was amended. An amendment was proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], which is now pending.

September 23, 1919, after the Senate had proceeded to consider the bill, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] raised his point of order.

In the meantime, as I stated a few moments ago, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], in order to avoid further controversy about the matter and to escape the criticism of his committee which is implied in the debate on the point of order, called a meeting of the committee and expressly served every member of the committee with notice of the purpose of the meeting and urged him to attend, and at that meeting no Senator moved or expressed a desire to recede from the former action taken by the nine members of the committee.

I point out the fact, as I did a day or two ago——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Not now, if the Senator will please excuse me.

I point out, as I did a day or two ago, the fact that the rules of this body, embraced in an amendment adopted April 12, 1912, provide that no bill shall be reported except by a concurrence of a majority of a majority of the committee. I also point out the fact that the express rules of this body do not require formal meetings of a committee nor prescribe that a committee may not report by poll.

I again renew my statement that for many years it has been the custom of the Senate to permit reports of committees by poll, and that in no instance has the Senate ever resented the action of a committee in proceeding in that way by sustaining a point of order after the Senate had considered the bill on several days.

As a matter of fact and of law, you must read into the rules of the Senate some provisions which are not there before the point of order can be sustained. The ruling of the then occupant of the chair, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], in my humble opinion, was correct. The correct procedure is to move to recommit the bill, and I support the chairman of the committee in that motion, not because I believe that the committee has acted improperly or that the nine members of the committee have sought to impose upon the Senate by pursuing the custom of the Senate and permitting a poll in order to report the bill, but because I believe that in the end it will facilitate the final consideration and passage of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to state that under the ruling of the Chair a point of order could be raised at any stage of the proceedings. I do not know to what rule he refers. If there has been such a ruling by the Chair——

Mr. LENROOT. That is an established rule of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator be kind enough to read the rule?

Mr. POMERENE. It is Rule XX.

Mr. LENROOT. Rule XX is as follows:

A question of order may be raised at any stage of proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing, and, unless submitted to the Senate, shall be decided by the presiding officer without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am familiar with that rule, but I thought possibly the Senator referred to some other rule that I did not recall.

Mr. LENROOT. A ruling was made very recently upon this identical question, upon a point of order raised by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If that is so, I am not familiar with that ruling. I assume I was not on the floor at the time it was made.

It seems to me, Mr. President, the rule read by the Senator from Wisconsin that a point of order can be raised at any time except when the roll is being called, and so forth, does not mean that a point of order can be raised at any time when the subject to which the point of order pertains is not before the Senate. I agree that a question of order is a question as to how we shall proceed at a particular time. I do not think the rule means that when the Senate is considering the third reading of a bill or its engrossment, a point of order can be raised that the bill had not been properly introduced by a Senator. It seems to me that the point of order must relate to the order which is then proceeding.

While I am not a member of the committee that reported the bill and have no interest in it whatever, I should be very glad to see it recommitted so that the committee may make such changes in the bill as it may desire and report it again. But it seems to me that after the bill has been reported from the committee and placed upon the calendar, and a motion made to proceed to its consideration by the Senate has been carried and the bill has been before the Senate and has been acted on partially and amended, then it is altogether too late to raise a point of order that the committee in reporting the bill had not acted properly or that it really was not an actual report of the committee. That point of order should have been raised at the time the committee reported the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator must know that upon its face the bill appears to have been regularly reported. How could one raise the point of order when upon the face of the bill it is regular, but it afterwards develops that the report was not a report at all?

Mr. ROBINSON. The remedy is to recommit.

Mr. LENROOT. We can not reserve points of order. If we could, the suggestion of the Senator would be correct, but the rules of the Senate do not permit one to reserve a point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The argument that a person did not have knowledge that a certain matter was subject to a point of order at the time alone at which it could be made is not at all an argument that a point of order may be made at some other time when it is not in order.

I admit the difficulty which the Senator suggests, that when a Senator reports a bill and the Chair refers it to the calendar, a Senator can not have any means of knowing that on the back of the bill there are the signatures of a majority of the members of the committee. Nevertheless, under the rules of the Senate that does not make it in order for him, after the third reading of the bill, or upon its engrossment, to make a point of order that there was not a quorum in the committee at the time the bill was acted upon, or that in the procedure the Senate had violated some of its own rules prior to its engrossment. I think the point of order should not have been entertained. I think it came altogether too late and was a point of order upon a question not then before the Senate at all; nor do I think the question of jurisdiction——

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Assume that the bill is about to be reached on the calendar, on a regular call of the calendar or on a motion to take it up, is it the Senator's view that no Senator could raise a question at that time that it had not been properly considered and reported?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is my view that it is too late.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. If a Senator desired to raise the question, he could do it upon a motion to recommit the bill to the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But that would not answer the question as to whether it is too late to raise a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree with the Senator that it is too late to raise the point of order, and I think the precedents sustain that view. The point of order could not lie after the Senate had proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not looked up the precedents. I am simply giving vent to ideas that occur to me in a commonsense way.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the Senator thinks the point of order should have been made before the matter had been considered by the Senate. The question is when the point of order may be made that the bill is not properly before the Senate. It ought to be made when the bill is brought into the Senate, but after a motion is made to consider the bill, then the question of the point of order would be a point against the consideration. Is that the Senator's view?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My claim is that whatever point of order might properly have been made at the time the bill was reported, as to the impropriety of its being reported or as to a Senate rule having been violated in its consideration by the committee or in its report by the committee to the Senate, it is too late to raise it at a subsequent stage of the proceedings. For instance, the rules provide that a bill shall be introduced by a Member rising in his place and sending it to the Secretary's desk, whereupon it is read the first time. Suppose a Senator drops a bill in the basket provided under the rules for the reception of routine petitions, bills for the correction of military records, and so forth, and suppose that bill is referred to a committee and the committee considers it and reports it, and it goes to the calendar and the Senate, upon due motion made, proceeds by an authorized majority vote to the consideration of the measure, and it is considered as in Committee of the Whole and amended and reported to the Senate, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole are concurred in, and the question is upon the third reading of the bill, and then a Senator rises and says, "I make the point of order that the bill was dropped in the basket instead of being sent to the desk and read by its title." The whole Senate has proceeded to approve the bill and there is nothing required but its final passage and the fall of the presiding officer's gavel to announce the will of the Senate. Is it true that a point of order as to the mere routine of its coming before the Senate could then be made to block out all the proceedings of the Senate up to that time?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator if this entire discussion and the basis of it is not an illustration of how not to do it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator may be correct. I think when in the chair yesterday I made a ruling on the spur of the moment which shows how not to do it in some respects. The situation was more or less tangled, and I had to rule and I think I ruled improperly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would suggest to the Senator that it is not claimed here that any rule of the Senate was violated by either not doing the proper thing or doing something that ought not to have been done by the committee. Jefferson's Manual is a part of the rules of the Senate. There is no claim that any rule of the Senate has been violated. On the contrary I call the Senator's attention——

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. FLETCHER. What rule of the Senate has been violated?

Mr. LENROOT. The rule that requires a report from a committee. There has never been a report.

Mr. FLETCHER. In Rule XXV there is an express provision that committees themselves may control the number that shall constitute a quorum of the committee, and also an express provision that the concurrence of a majority of the committee is sufficient to bring a measure before the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. In the committee and after a vote, certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The rule says the concurrence of a majority of the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. In the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Here is a report signed by nine members of the committee. I doubt if you could find a report of a committee which more completely and accurately represents the views of a majority of a committee than does this report. It is the written assent and concurrence of a majority of the committee, and not only of a majority of the committee but of 9 members out of 16 in favor of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator from Florida will yield for a question, I should like to ask him what was the purpose of the very rule of which he speaks, providing that a quorum might consist of one-third of the membership of the committee, if no meeting at all of the committee is required?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Florida will allow me, I will read subdivision 3 of Rule XXV in its entirety in order that the Senate may get the purpose of the rule.

QUORUM OF COMMITTEES.

3. That the several standing committees of the Senate having a membership of more than three Senators are hereby respectively authorized to fix, each for itself, the number of its members who shall constitute a quorum thereof for the transaction of such business as may be considered by said committee; but in no case shall a committee, acting under authority of this resolution, fix as a quorum thereof any number less than one-third of its entire membership, nor shall any report be made to the Senate that is not authorized by the concurrence of more than one-half of a majority of such entire membership.

The rule provides for the concurrence of one-half of a majority of the committee. It does not say in committee or elsewhere; it does not say anything on that point.

Mr. LENROOT. But what was the purpose of the rule? It requires a quorum consisting of one-third of the membership, but, for the protection of the Senate, although one-third of the membership might constitute a quorum, a majority of the one-third could not report a bill. It is very clear to any Senator. The rule relates to a quorum, and it relates to votes in the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But we are speaking about the report the committee made. The rule provides:

Nor shall any report be made to the Senate that is not authorized—

Can I not as a member of a committee authorize action so far as I am concerned when some Senator comes to me while in my seat and says, "You are a member of the committee, and I want you to authorize me to report this bill"? The rule says, "Not authorized by the concurrence of more than one-half of a majority."

Mr. LENROOT. If that were true, why was it necessary to provide for the number of a committee that should constitute a quorum?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me, as I desire to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the theory of the Senator from South Carolina, what protection could the minority ever have to secure the consideration of a bill in committee?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The custom here, as all of us know, has been to proceed with what is called a working majority. In the case of the wire-control bill that practice was called in question, and I suppose on account of an oversight or ignorance of parliamentary law on the part of some of us the rule which I have quoted was not invoked. I confess I did not then know the rule was in existence. Had I been so advised I should have maintained that one-third of a majority, or, in other words, a working quorum was present; but everyone knows that a majority of the minor bills of the Senate are reported as this one has been.

The protection of which the Senator speaks comes when the bill is before the Senate. The fact of the matter is that the real business is done after a bill gets here, and I do not know but what we would have been better off as to a great many bills if they had never been referred to a committee to have matters thrashed over and the minds of members of the committee prejudiced by the opinions of others before the bill got here. I do not think the objection raised is at all serious.

Mr. LENROOT. Then if the majority desires to put a bill through the Senate it can, without a violation of the rules, deprive the minority from ever securing the consideration of a bill in committee at all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. They could deprive the minority of that opportunity by providing for a certain number less than a majority, as provided in this rule.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; I mean by a poll of the majority, the Republican members. If the Republicans shall at some time in the future desire to put through a bill, the majority members can sign their names on the back of the bill and say to you Democrats, "We will never give you an opportunity even to consider this bill in committee," and you yourselves will have made the rule.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; but we would discuss the bill on the floor of the Senate and reach the same end.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has made allusion to the jurisdiction of a court as analogous to this question. I fail to perceive the force of that suggestion. The question here is not as to the jurisdiction of the Senate; no one questions the jurisdiction of the Senate under the Constitution to deal with this measure. The question here is simply as to whether the bill was properly reported by a committee of the Senate. As I have said, I think the point of order upon that question came too late. I agree with the Senators who have suggested that it has been a very common practice in the case of bills to which there was no particular known opposition and where it was very difficult to get a quorum of the committee, owing to the pressure of other affairs, for the chairman to send such bills around to members of the committee, who, after having read them and approved them, signed their names to them. Their action has rarely been questioned in the Senate, to my knowledge, as not being a proper procedure. Yet I am entirely in sympathy with the point of order made by the Senator from Wisconsin on its merits, if it had been made at the proper time, because——

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question there?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's idea of the proper time, I presume, is when the bill is reported. Now, is not the Senator requiring an impossibility?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I am not; it may be that the rules are. The Senator from Wisconsin has already raised that question and said that nobody could know when the bill is actually reported whether it has been considered by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin; but I understand the Senator from Connecticut has a different idea. I have heard his explanation, but it is not convincing to me. It seems to me that the rule which the Senator suggests would require an impossibility. The Senator must know that for all practical purposes it would be requiring an impossibility and would not accomplish anything. If the Senator's construction of the rule is right and the point of order must be made at the time a bill is reported, then we might just as well, it seems to me, abolish committees, because there is not any doubt that any committee of the Senate at any time can get a bill legally before the Senate without Senators not members of the committee knowing that there has not been a meeting of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand the difficulty and embarrassment suggested by both the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Wisconsin in that respect, but, Mr. President, the rules of the Senate and their administration frequently work out awkward conditions. There is no reason, however, for the stretching of the rules or for a construction of them contrary to their evident meaning. As suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, there is another remedy for such a situation. At a later time a Senator may be prohibited from availing himself of the opportunity of making the point of order which he could have made if he had known about the bill being improperly reported from the committee, but the other remedy is to move for the recommittal of the bill, which motion is now pending.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question in regard to that?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, of course, will concede that a motion to recommit can be made in any event, even if the bill has been reported properly by the committee?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will also concede, I think, that if a Senator has as a matter of right the privilege of objecting to the consideration of a bill for any irregularity, a motion to recommit the bill does not save that right, because that requires a majority of the Senate voting on the question the same as any other motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But a Senator has no right to object to such a motion any more than to record his vote.

Mr. NORRIS. But there is a right given to a Senator by a point of order in that it is one he can exercise without the assistance or acquiescence of any other Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That does not apply to a motion to recommit.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That comes right back to the same question we are discussing, as to whether the point of order is in order at the time it is made.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say about this question. I am in favor of the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment before the Senator from North Carolina proceeds. The Chair is going to allow on this question, in accordance with the rule, but two speeches from now on in this discussion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think perhaps as much time has been taken in connection with this matter as ought to be devoted to it, and yet the more I think of it the more I am convinced that the question at issue is one of very great importance.

After very serious reflection, I do not think that we could do a more unfortunate thing for the dispatch of the business of this body, now congested and likely to be congested so long as conditions exist which require so much legislation, than to overturn a practice that has obtained in this body during the 18 years I have been a Member of it. It is a practice which has contributed enormously to the expedition of the business of this body, and I have not during my term here discovered any instance where injustice or wrong has resulted. The proposition needs to be discussed not in its technical features so much as in its practical features.

If this procedure is to apply to legislation, it must also apply to all nominations that are presented to this body. If the Senate can not consider a matter unless a committee has formally acted in connection with it, neither can it consider a nomination that is reported back from a committee without action by the committee while in actual session. Yet my experience here has taught me that the greater number of bills reported to the Senate and acted upon have come from committee without any real committee consideration by the full committee, but upon a poll of a committee. My experience teaches me that practically four-fifths of the nominations that are reported from committees come back without the committees ever having sat in session upon those nominations. I undertake to say that, in the present congested condition here, with a greater amount of legislation required of this body than ever before has been required in the history of our country, an amount of legislation that keeps us in session for 9 or 10 months in the year—if we can not consider anything except bills that are actually considered in committee session, it will very much delay our action upon legislation.

We have a situation here that frequently requires a Senator to be appointed upon half a dozen committees, two or three of them live, active committees. The time of the committees is taken up with the important matters of the Government, with legislation that really requires the most careful consideration, and the committees have difficulty in getting committee action upon those matters. Now, if every little matter, if every little local bill, if every little routine bill, every bridge bill, must be taken up by a committee in actual session and considered by a committee, we will increase the labors of the committees twofold; and if we add to that requirement that every nomination must be taken up by a committee and considered in session, we will increase the labors of the committees more than twofold, and we will leave no time for the consideration of the more important business of the Senate. I say that when we refer to these committees these small, local matters, these matters of relatively trifling importance, we do it perfunctorily. We do not need the advice of the committee in those cases. The rule covers them, however, and perfunctorily we refer them to the committee, and perfunctorily the committee reports them out. The committees do not, under the rule, report out important measures without consideration; it is these other less important measures; but this action, if it is taken, will cover everything. It will cover the most insignificant as well as the most important bills; it will cover the most insignificant nominations as well as the most important nominations, the uncontested as well as the contested nominations; and we will have a congestion here that will not only be appalling to the Senators, but it will be obstructive to the legislation of this country and against the welfare of the people; not in the interest of good legislation but in the interest of hurried and bad legislation.

Mr. President, I say this practice has grown up here. I do not know how old it is. I know it is at least 18 years old. I assume that the practice has grown up and has continued uninterrupted and without challenge until now because it was the consensus of the best judgment of this body that it was a good and a wise practice in the interest of expediting legislation.

Mr. President, I want the Senate to consider for a minute what might be the condition here in the last days of the session, when we are hurrying to get through with the business of the session, when it very frequently becomes necessary for us to act speedily and quickly upon a joint resolution that may come here from the departments, absolutely necessary to continue in motion the wheels of government. It may relate to the entire appropriation of a great department. The failure of its passage would result in blocking the wheels and the machinery of a great instrumentality of the Government. We must hurriedly get that joint resolution or that bill through the Senate. If we are compelled to send it to a committee, and then a majority of that committee must be assembled and act, it will be too late. I have seen numbers of cases since I have been here where, if the practice that is now insisted upon had obtained, it would have been impossible for us to pass during the last few days of the session legislation that was absolutely essential.

Mr. President, I contend that this practice is a construction by the Senate of the United States, a long-standing and unquestioned construction, of the meaning of the rule. It is its construction that a report of a bill as the result of a poll, with the signatures of a majority of the committee upon the back of the report, is a substantial compliance with the rule, ought to cease.

Now, the Senator from Wisconsin says that this practice, this construction, must go for naught, because, forsooth, we have not jurisdiction of the matter, and if we have not jurisdiction, of course, we have no right or power to act.

Why, Mr. President, it is fundamental in legal practice that if a court or a legislative body or a municipal body has not jurisdiction of the subject matter, there can be no waiver of procedure at all which would give vitality to its action; but if a body have jurisdiction of the subject matter, then every requirement of practice, every rule of practice, can be waived. Whenever it is ascertained that the court has jurisdiction of a subject matter, attorneys can waive the failure to serve summons; attorneys can waive any limitation of time; attorneys can waive anything that is connected with the procedure of the court after it acquires jurisdiction. Will anybody undertake to say that the Senate of the United States did not acquire jurisdiction of the subject matter of this legislation the minute that the bill passed a second reading? It has jurisdiction of the subject matter, and, having jurisdiction of the subject matter, it may by any practice that it may establish waive at any time any of the rules of procedure which it has adopted. Certainly nobody should question the right of the Senate of the United States to waive by unanimous consent any rule that is written here after it has acquired jurisdiction.

Mr. President, that is what this rule means. It means that when certain formalities are complied with, the Senate having acquired jurisdiction of the subject matter, the rules of procedure may be waived unless there is objection. Now, the protection is this, and the Senator is absolutely wrong when he says that we might have a bill here that would be acted upon without the consent of a majority of the committee—I have understoood since I have been here that the rule was this—that when a committee is polled there must be the concurrence of a majority of the committee; it must be written upon the back of the bill or vouched for by the statement of the chairman reporting it. And even then the practice, as I have understood it, was that if there was a single objection to its report by that method it should go back to the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator misunderstood me. I never said that a bill could be reported by a poll of less than a majority of the committee. I did say that under the Senator's position a majority of the committee, without consulting the minority, could report a bill, and the minority would never have a right to consider the bill in committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the right of deliberation is absolutely protected. A majority of the committee must concur. A single, solitary objection can prevent the report.

Mr. LENROOT. Where does the Senator find any such rule?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not say there was such a rule, but I said that was a practice that had grown up here and obtained for the last 18 years.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator, then, admits that if a majority poll, without consulting the minority, reports a bill, no objection on the part of the minority can prevail?

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that the report could not be made under the practice, not the rule, under the practice which has grown up under the rule, and which is an interpretation of the rule, unless a majority of the members of the committee had signified their approval by signing the report, and that even then, under this practice, when the report is made, one objection would send it back to the committee at the time. That has been the practice, as I have understood it, here.

Under that practice, I say, nobody is denied any right. What do we send these things to a committee for? Not that the committee may control our action, but simply that the Senate may have advice. If the Senate does not want the advice of the committee it can recall the bill at any time it sees fit. If the Senate can recall the bill at any time it sees fit and say to the committee, "We do not desire your advice now," the Senate can, by like action, refuse to send the bill to a committee at any time, and the Senate can by like action establish a practice that will permit the bill to come back to it without its having been actually considered in the committee as a whole, and that practice we have established. In the last analysis the question is, Does the legislation meet with the concurrence of a majority of the Senate? To tell me that a committee report is so fundamental that it can not be waived; that we can not establish a practice and get rid of it in minor cases; that it can, after a bill has been taken up and a month of the people's time has been devoted to its consideration, the rule can be invoked and the bill can be kicked out of the Senate simply because of failure to comply with some little formality the sole purpose of which was to obtain information which the Senate no longer desires or demands is, to my mind, to state a preposterous proposition.

Mr. President, there are a great many objections to procedure in the courts of our country and in legislative bodies that may be made, and, if made in apt time, must be recognized and must be given force and effectiveness; but I have never in my life heard of any court or any legislative body which after a lapse of time, after it had proceeded upon the theory that all the formalities and technicalities required had been complied with, would permit the whole proceedings to be dropped and halted by an objection which is made out of time.

The Senator says he did not know of this circumstance, and he seems to think that is a conclusive reason why the point should be made at any time. Why it should be made after the bill has been considered a month, why it should be made after it has been considered two months and when the body is ready to act, I can not understand.

Mr. President, it is just as much the duty of a man who wants to make a technical objection to be on the alert as it is the duty of the man who wants to make a substantive objection. A man has no more right in this case to come in and plead that "I did not know of my rights at the time," "I did not have actual information at the time," than a man would be entitled to go into court and say that "I did not know the law when I violated it." The whole machinery of this body can not be stopped because of a purely technical objection, not made in time, and which, if made in time, probably might have been entitled to be acted upon.

Mr. President, I recognize the fact that the party to which I belong is in the minority. The Senator has invoked the rights of the minority. I recognize the fact that the committees of this body are in charge of the majority. I recognize the fact that all the chairmen of the larger committees are Republicans, and the chairmen under this practice could practically control the reporting of bills without actually bringing them before the committees. I therefore recognize the fact that the position I am taking, considered from a purely tactical party standpoint, is not the position which is most advantageous at this time to the party to which I belong. But I would be a small man, and any Democratic Senator here would be a small man, if, because his party might lose an otherwise helpful advantage in connection with legislation, he would give sanction to action in this body which would enormously increase the labors of Senators, already overburdened with work, and which would result in great congestion where there is already an overcrowded condition.

Mr. President, I did not intend to speak so long about this matter, and I would not have done so but for the fact that I believe if we should sustain the point of order made by the Senator from Wisconsin—though the vote the other day indicated that there is a strong sentiment on the other side of the Chamber to sustain it—the effects upon legislation and upon the labors entailed upon Senators in this body which would be avoided would be so series that the time which I have taken and the time which other Senators have taken in this matter will not have been wasted, because if we can defeat the point of order of the Senator we will save much more time than has been taken in the consideration of this matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I had supposed that it was agreed by everyone that rules were made primarily for the orderly procedure of a parliamentary body and the protection of the minority. The Senator who has just spoken says the minority cares for no protection. Mr. President, I know that as a rule Senators pay little or no attention to the rules of the Senate upon any particular bill. I realize, too, Mr. President, that Senators on this side of the aisle will have no reason to complain of the new rule that will be made by sustaining the decision of the Chair on my point of order, because the party on this side of the aisle will be in a majority for many, many years to come. If the ruling is sustained, I say now that the time will come when Senators on the other side of the aisle who will still be here will be raising the very point of order that they are now going to vote to overturn.

I had supposed, Mr. President, that the opinions of Mr. Jefferson would still have some weight, at least upon the other side of the Chamber. But apparently not. We certainly have been growing very fast during the past few years. Nevertheless, although I know that Mr. Jefferson is out of date on the Democratic side of the aisle, and his opinions are no longer considered of any very great value, may I take a moment to read what Mr. Jefferson said in his preface to his Manual of Parliamentary Practice? Mr. Jefferson says:

> Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say it was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration and those who acted with the majority of the House of Commons than a neglect of or a departure from the rules of proceeding; that these forms, as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were, in many instances, a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempts of power. So far the maxim is certainly true and is founded in good sense; that as it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and are become the law of the house, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.

The members of the minority say they require no protection, that they are willing to trust the majority. Why have any rules of the Senate at all? You are deliberately proposing to violate two of them when you vote to sustain the decision of the Chair—first, that there need be no act of a committee at all; that there need be no report of a committee at all; that even a third of a quorum is not necessary in order to consider a bill; that the chairman alone may sit in his committee room and take up a bill and consider it himself, and then go out and get the signatures of enough members of the committee to make a report. You propose to call that a report of the committee. Who ever authorized this chairman to make a report upon this bill, if it was made as a committee report? Where was the authority for any Senator, sitting in his seat in the Senate, to say to the chairman of my committee, "You are authorized to report this bill"? It could not be done without deliberately violating the rules of the Senate.

But it is said the point of order comes too late; that it should have been made at the time the report was presented. I agree that if we had the procedure of the House, which I think is preferable to that of the Senate, and one could reserve a point of order when a report was made from a committee, that ought to be done, and then if the point of order was not reserved, it should be considered as waived; if the point of order was not reserved when the report was made, the point of order could not thereafter be raised.

But it so happens that the Senate has deliberately adopted a different rule. It so happens that the Senate has said in this rule that a point of order can be made at any stage of the proceedings.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator assert that there is no such limitation as that expressed by the Senator from Connecticut on the meaning of the rule?

Mr. LENROOT. The rule means what it says.

Mr. ROBINSON. In this case, after the Senate has repeatedly voted to proceed with the consideration of the bill, and has amended the bill, the Senator insists that it is in order to make this point of order. I ask the Senator whether it would be in order to make such a point of order after the Senate had passed the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. It would be in order, I am very frank to say to the Senator, at any time, so long as the bill had not gone out of the physical possession of the Senate. Of course, if it had gone to the House, there would be no way by which the Senate could take such action.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then it would be in order to make the point of order after the Senate had passed the bill and before the bill had passed out of the possession of the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. Before the bill had passed out of the possession of the Senate, I agree. The Senator from Arkansas smiles. That may be something that ought to be provided against in the rules; but so long as you have a rule of the Senate that a committee must act upon a bill before the Senate can act upon it, there are only three ways in which a bill can come before the Senate. You may suspend the rule; you may move to discharge the committee; and the committee may make a proper report. In no other way can a bill properly get upon the calendar, and my point of order is that this bill is not properly upon the calendar, and is not properly before the Senate.

Senators talk about little bills. If the rule applies to little bills, it applies to the most important bills coming before the Senate. The position of the Senator from Arkansas would be that I, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, could send to the desk what purported to be a report from the Committee on Commerce, because I would not even have to have a majority of the committee in order to give the Senate jurisdiction, for there is nothing that provides for a poll of a majority of a committee, and the only way the Senate could get rid of that bill would be by a majority vote. Or I could sit here at my desk and send a bill around to those whom I knew were in favor of the bill, at the same time knowing that a minority was opposed to the bill and desirous of amending it. Under the Senator's theory I could get those signatures, send that bill to the desk, and the minority, either upon the committee or in the Senate, never would have an opportunity guaranteed to them by the rules of the Senate to consider the bill in committee.

If the Senate desires to make a precedent of that kind, well and good. The Senate will do it with its eyes open, and I think there are some of us who can stand it if others can. But Senators say that to sustain this point of order would prevent the polling of committees, a practice that has grown up with reference to minor bills. That is not so, Mr. President. If the point of order is sustained, it will not interfere in the least degree with the practice of polling committees, because in ninety cases out of a hundred there is no objection to the reception of a report at any stage of the proceedings upon minor bills. If there is no objection, it amounts to the Senate considering them by unanimous consent. All this point of order, if sustained, will do is to give to any Senator the right to make the point of order if he desires to do so; and I submit that he ought to have that right. It ought to be the right of every Senator upon this floor to insist, and see to it, unless there be a suspension of the rules or a discharge of the committee, that the rules of the Senate are enforced, and that when a bill is referred to a committee it shall be considered by that committee.

As I said before, that was the very crux of liberalizing the rules in 1911, by the Democratic side of the Senate, at the suggestion of the late Senator from Georgia, Mr. Bacon. It was on his motion that the number required for a quorum at that time was lessened. But if you read the debates, as I have them before me, you will see that no one ever suggested that a report of a committee could properly be made to the Senate unless there was a meeting of the committee.

Suppose that upon a tariff bill the Republican members of the committee did not meet, but determined that they did not want to give the Democrats any opportunity to offer any amendments in committee to the bill or give them any opportunity to consider it, and so upon a great tariff bill the majority members of the committee signed their names on the back of the bill and sent it to the desk, does anyone think that there would not be a majority of the Democrats, who to-day are going to vote to sustain the ruling of the Chair, who would be the first to invoke this very point of order for the protection of the rights of the minority?

I am just one Senator; I do not pretend to have any very great knowledge of parliamentary law; but the longer I serve in this body the more I am convinced that it is not necessary for anyone to have any knowledge of parliamentary law. It would be very much better, in my judgment, with the attitude the Senate so often takes upon the rules, if we did not have rules at all, because if a body like this makes rules for its own observance and then deliberately violates them when it suits its own convenience to do so, how can we expect the people of the country to have respect for the laws that we enact? It seems to me that we ought to begin to inculcate respect for the laws of our country by this body beginning to have some respect for its own rules.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the German treaty in open executive session.

Mr. ROBINSON. May we not have a vote on this question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think everyone is ready to vote.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; everyone is ready for a vote. I ask that we may vote.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If there are no more speeches to be made I will withhold the motion for the purpose of having a vote.

So the Senate decided that the decision of the Chair should stand as the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The motion was agreed to.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, in the course of the many times I have read the treaty now before the Senate, and after what I think I can claim has been a fairly diligent study of it, I have found some features of which I approve, many more of which I disapprove, while there still remain some as to the proper construction of which I am in doubt. As to these last I can find my excuse in the fact that to this day the more or less eminent statesmen who drew it, and to whom we look for its definition, disagree among themselves and before the public in the construction they put upon certain of its articles.

Mr. President, I have been curious to know just what objection could be legitimately urged to the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], which provides that the voting strength of the United States in the league shall equal that of Great Britain. The claim that the voting superiority of Great Britain is apparent rather than real is not warranted by the facts as I see them. Recently a league of nations organization addressed a number of inquiries to President Wilson, and on September 18, under a San Francisco date line, he answered one, in which he was asked about the six votes of Great Britain, by saying:

> It is not true that the British Empire can outvote us in the league of nations and therefore control the action of the league, because in every matter except the admission of new members to the league no action can be taken without the concurrence of a unanimous vote of the representatives of the States which are members of the council, so that in all matters of action the affirmative vote of the United States is necessary and equivalent to the united vote of the representatives of the several parts of the British Empire.

Surely the President overlooks the fact that in those disputes in which America is concerned we have no vote at all. He also overlooks the fact that under article 15 if a dispute be referred to the assembly there may be a report made public by the majority of the assembly, in which majority Great Britain would have six votes to our one. And even more important is the President's failure to remember that under article 4 the assembly has the right to choose four members of the council, and there appears to be no doubt that the assembly may elect by a majority vote. When it comes to electing these four members of the council, Great Britain would start with six votes accredited to the home government and the colonies, in addition to which she would control the vote of Persia and Hedjaz. If there is any provision in the covenant which forbids elections to the council to be other than by the usual majority vote, I can not find it and would be pleased to have some Senator point it out. I therefore charge that when the President states that Great Britain can not cast more votes than the United States in the election of the four elective members of the council, he either misunderstands or misrepresents the provisions of the covenant, and is to that extent misleading the American people. His new mathematical theorem that 1 plus 1 plus 1 plus 1 plus 1 equals 1 will not bear analysis.

Mr. President, I said in my preliminary remarks that there was great diversity of opinion, even among those whose official function it is to construe and define the treaty, over the construction to be put upon its respective provisions. This is certainly true, for they differ on so many points as to awaken the apprehensions of the ordinary observer. None of its exponents, however, has displayed the versatility of the President, who felicitously construes the same provision in diametrically different ways on different occasions in order to meet the emergencies and the expectation of those addressed. The truth of this was conclusively demonstrated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in his address of Monday last when he produced the letter of May 6, 1919, signed by the President, Lloyd-George, and Mr. Clemenceau, in which the most explicit assurance is given the Canadian premier that Canada is eligible to a place in the council, which necessarily implies full voting membership in the league. In view of this assurance, in what an absurd and untenable position is the President left by his reply to the San Francisco organization.

Nor is that the only misstatement that has been made by the President in his recent discussion of the treaty. In the very nature of things, the treaty and the covenant, huge as it is in size, complicated as it is in phraseology, and dealing with subjects with which the lay mind is necessarily unfamiliar, is a document that will not be read by more than a respectable minority of the people under any circumstances that may arise. Such addresses as the President has made on his western trip are not entirely suitable for a serious and accurate discussion of a question of this intricate character; and we may, therefore, be pardoned if we object to any statement concerning it which is not exactly true or the ambiguity of which leaves the public in doubt. Whatever lapses from accuracy the President might make under such circumstances, one would not expect him to misstate or to forget the circumstances, for instance, which drew America into the war; and yet, in his speech at Billings, Mont., September 11, he said:

> Thousands of our gallant youth lie buried in France. Buried for what? For the protection of America? America was not directly attacked.

And in his speech at Tacoma, September 13, the President said:

> Only the free people of the world can join the league of nations.

Is it possible that for the moment he forgot India; that he overlooked Hedjaz and failed to recall Persia? Are either of these nations in any sense either free, self-governing, or democratic? But the statement is no more or no less inaccurate than many others which the President has made on this same tour. At Spokane the President said on September 12, in speaking of the right to withdraw from the league:

> Gentlemen object that it is not said who shall determine whether it has fulfilled its international obligations and its obligations under the covenant or not. Having sat at the table where the instrument was drawn, I know that that was not done accidentally, because that is a matter upon which no nation can sit in judgment upon another. That is left to the conscience and to the independent determination of the nation that is withdrawing.

Apparently the President must have forgotten articles 13 and 15 of the covenant. Article 13 provides that disputes suitable for arbitration shall be so submitted, and expressly states that the interpretation of the treaty and the covenant as part of the treaty, as well as any pact which would constitute a breach of any international obligation, are generally suitable for arbitration. Under this provision we would be required to arbitrate the question whether we had fulfilled our obligations, and under article 15, if either we or our opponent who objected to our withdrawal declined arbitration, we would be required to "submit the matter to the council." How can the President correctly say that we are the sole judges of our right to withdraw from the league when its covenant requires us either to arbitrate or submit to the council any dispute as to our fulfillment of our obligation?

Nor do I think that the President has been at all times happy in his comparisons. For instance, in one of the speeches made on his western trip he told his audience that the league is insurance against war—in his opinion, 98 per cent insurance—but he added that if it were only 10 per cent he would favor it. Now let us look at this for a moment. Do fire insurance policies prevent fire? They sometimes cause it but never prevent it.

Fire is prevented not by insurance but by the care of the owners and tenants of the property. It is prevented by fireproof construction, and the spread of fire is limited, not by insurance, but by fire departments. If insurance does not prevent fire, what does it do? It distributes the losses. That is just what the league of nations will surely do. It will not prevent war either 98 per cent or 10 per cent and the President himself has admitted its fallibility in this particular. It is more apt to cause war, but it will of a certainty distribute the losses. And how are the losses to be apportioned in this mutual war insurance company called the league of nations? Are they apportioned like fire insurance according to the relative risk? An insurance company fixes its rates with due regard to the character of the risk. Does the tinder box of the Balkans pay a higher premium than fireproof America? On the very contrary, the losses are distributed under this league not in proportion to the risk of war but in proportion to wealth and population. America, guarded as she is by the great seas, strong and free, with no historic quarrel, and up to this time without a single entanglement, will be the chief loser by any conflagration that may be hereafter started in any part of the world. And how are our losses to be paid? Not in money alone, not in ships and munitions, but in the lives of the youth of the country. If the league offers war insurance, it offers what will not prevent war. It offers the sacrifice and waste of our youth, with its radiant promise, in distant countries and alien lands, in quarrels which are not our own, which we can not prevent and for which we have no responsibility.

But the President says he believes the league will prevent war. Many a man has believed in fiction. The mirage in the desert is as plainly visible to the man who is lost in the wilderness as is the substantial thing itself to the man to whom it is sufficiently close at hand to be accessible to the touch. Don Quixote believed Rozinante a war horse. He believed a tin washbasin to be a gold helmet and windmills to be an army in battle. As for me, I believe the President's dream of the actualities of this league to be scarcely less visionary than the hallucinations of the Don. Why, Mr. President, I have seen and known people who believed firmly that a potato carried in the pocket would prevent rheumatism; that a silk thread around the neck would prevent sore throat. I have known a man to carry a buckeye for the greater part of a lifetime and to attribute his immunity from disease to his possession of that cherished fetish. When the President tells his audience that the league is insurance against war, he calls to my mind the hypnotist, whom we have all seen, who has his subject eat a piece of chalk in the delicious hallucination that it is ice cream, and to accept the thrust of a pin in the flesh as a caress. The presumptive difference is that in our case we shall realize the deception when we have been restored to consciousness and sanity.

The President further said in another of his speeches that the league of nations would "prevent war by discussion" and that it was in fact a "debating society." Surely, Mr. President, we will all favor the establishment of a forum suitable for international discussion, but does a "debating society" boycott, starve, and make war upon those of its members who do not accept the decision of the society at the end of the debate? Do the members of a debating society make war in any part of the world where its judgments are not followed? Does a debating society bind itself to enforce its decisions upon those who are not even members of the society? The league may be a debating society, but it does not stop at that. It is a superstate, or if not that it is nothing but a delusion and a snare.

The President says the weakest point in the league is the rule requiring a unanimous vote. He thinks the decision by a smaller number ought to be binding. I have no doubt that England, France, Italy, and Japan share the President's views. I have no doubt that England with her six votes feels with characteristic British liberality that they should be sufficient to decide the course of the States associated with her. To me it is, to say the least, disconcerting to hear the President make such a pronouncement. If the league be founded, may we not expect soon to have the powers of the superstate made more effective, as they would be if this view of the President were to prevail?

It has been persistently urged by those who plead for the retention in the covenant of article 10 that it is reciprocal in its obligations, that admitting by its terms the United States guarantees the territory of every other member State our territory is in turn guaranteed us by them. I have felt that this contention is misleading and deceptive, and now comes the President to establish the validity of my doubts by this statement, made in his speech at Spokane September 12:

> Ah, but some may seek to seize our territory, impair our political independence. Well, who? Who has an arm long enough to try to take a single inch of American territory or to seek to interfere for one moment with the political independence of the United States? These gentlemen are dreaming of things that can not happen.

Truly the proponents of the league should get together, for in this utterance the President shows that article 10 is a one-sided arrangement, with the United States in the position of guarantor of the possessions of others, with every prospect of being called upon to fulfill them by the exercise of force and no possible likelihood of having to appeal to others for a like or reciprocal service. To insure any degree of permanency to a league of the character contemplated, there must be equality of conditions imposed upon its members. Where there is a manifest disparity, as in the present instance, dissatisfaction and disruption are bound to come with time, and the length of time required to bring them about depends only upon the complacency of those less favored and their willingness to have the burdens of others pressed constantly upon their shoulders. Mr. President, I disagree absolutely with the plea that the preservation of human liberty will not be safe unless and until the United States is made to entangle itself in the affairs of Europe and assumes a share in their direction. We have no aptitude for the successful performance of any such task, and the peoples of Europe have no real understanding of the spirit of our institutions. The difference between our habits of thought, our methods of government, and theirs is widely dissimilar and irreconcilable. Why is it necessary to bind America to respond to every demand that may be hereafter made upon her to aid in the adjustment of Europe's quarrels, even though their origin be charged to the external aggression of a covetous or ambitious neighbor? The United States may be trusted to do again just what she did in the present instance should there be real occasion for it.

So far as the position of the United States toward future wars of foreign origin is concerned, I believe it was correctly expressed in the resolution introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], as follows:

> That, finally, it shall be the declared policy of our Government, in order to meet fully and fairly our obligations to ourselves and to the world, that the freedom and peace of Europe being again threatened by any power or combination of powers, the United States will regard such a situation with grave concern as a menace to its own peace and freedom, will consult with other powers affected with a view to devising means for the removal of such menace, and will, the necessity arising in the future, carry out the same complete accord and cooperation with our chief cobelligerents for the defense of civilization.

Such a declaration as this would be all that is necessary. It would serve notice to the world that would be heard and heeded. The world knows that the United States would keep the promise. While accomplishing the result intended it would leave us free to pursue our own course in our own way, free from foreign dictation or from embarrassing alliances.

Mr. President, it strikes me that by the obligations of the league we are binding the wrong parties. There is not the slightest disposition on the part of any of the recent European allied powers to engage in further armed strife, at least not in the near future, and certainly not all that is desired is to be gained by obtaining their signatures to a contract the provisions of which they would follow without a formal pact. No league that can be formed can carry with it any real guaranty of future world peace that does not take into full account and have as parties to it Germany and Russia, the Ishmael and Samson of the peoples of the world. So long as either of them is out, the world is on the brink of the volcano, and there are unmistakable signs not only of an alliance between them, but possibly what will constitute a virtual amalgamation, at least for the purposes of offense and defense.

Mr. President, what was the world position of the United States in August, 1914? And what is it to-day? On the first-named date we were in peaceful accord with all the nations of the earth with the single exception of our neighbor on the south—Mexico; and it is profitless to discuss here the reasons for our estrangement there. We had the good will and respect of every other nation on the face of the globe. To be sure, some of them may have been amused at what they conceived to be our eccentricities, and laughed a little at us now and then; but they respected Uncle Sam as a beneficent and benevolent old gentleman whose presence was a joy and a delight. If he has to-day a single true friend remaining among the major powers, no Senator can point him out. One can but marvel at the genius displayed by our representatives in the transformation of friends into enemies, or the degree of success they have attained in that direction, even though we deplore the result. Japan hates us because we questioned the morality of the Shantung transaction; China, because she trusted us as her friend and protector, and we have up to this hour failed to justify the trust. Great Britain distrusts us because she thinks we have interfered with the Irish question, while the Irish know that we but trifled with it for reasons that concern our domestic politics. The Greeks despise us because we have shown a purpose to give Thrace to her ancient enemy, Bulgaria. The French, our devoted friends for the greater part of our national life, distrust and dislike us, as is well known to every American who has had occasion to sojourn on the soil of France since the signing of the armistice. That the French estimate of the American character has recently undergone a pronounced change to our distinct disadvantage is but too well known. Italy, which welcomed the President in a spirit of adoration, and whose peasants prostrated themselves before him along the roadsides where he passed on his visit of a few brief months ago, turns in frenzy upon us because of our interference with the question of the disposition of Fiume. Our most implicit and trustful friend among them all was Russia. To her people the United States was an object of admiration and veneration. Her faith in us was childlike but supreme. She thrust the prows of her ships and the muzzles of her guns between us and threat of danger when we were fearful of "external aggression" in our darkest hour. To-day there is none in Russia to do us reverence. We have sacrificed her friendship along with the lives of many of our own soldier youth by a policy of pure meddlesomeness, without aim or purpose; the only result of which, so far as its effect on Russia is concerned, has been to turn every Russian hand against us.

Such is the partial result to date of our first disregard of the advice and caution of the fathers—of Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, Madison, Hamilton, Adams, Patrick Henry, and the others whose names will be forever illustrious as the founders of the great Republic. I know that a reference to them provokes a smile from friends of this proposed league and a sneer from a portion of the American press, but, Mr. President, I can not think that they knew not what they said, nor why they said it, when they advised that America should mind her own business. They had in mind not only their own present, but the future as well, and if they did not envision in detail this proposal for a league which should include the Government they were engaged in founding, they foresaw it in substance and effect. That was one of the attributes that made them great—faculty or gift—their ability to foresee and to forewarn. But here we are to-day engaged in settling European boundaries and possessions, dictating who shall have this town and that river, distributing provinces and bailiwicks, municipalities and principalities, with a familiarity and finality that enrages the dispossessed and disappoints the recipient, leaving nowhere and with nobody any feeling other than that of disapproval and resentment. There is no more prolific source of litigation and feud than the location of a line fence. Every country lawyer knows that, every farmer knows it, yet here we are locating line fences for former friends and enemies alike, with a disregard of consequences that is inconceivably reckless to those who pause to institute comparisons.

The insufficiency and inefficiency of the league is made nowhere more manifest than in the precaution taken in the chancelleries of the great powers to supplement and augment its forces and in the guaranties demanded by them independent of the league. Does the attitude of England indicate faith in its potency? Lloyd-George, Lord Cecil, Gen. Smuts may utter sounding phrases, but they have first made sure what England wanted. The material affairs of the British Empire were very carefully provided for before they committed the Government to the league. The first thing she did was to decline positively and with finality to even consider the acceptance of the second of the President's 14 points—that relating to the freedom of the seas. No degree of altruism, no concession to the plea for the "universal brotherhood of man," that carried with it the slightest diminution of Great Britain's maritime supremacy was even left open to discussion. There is nowhere in the covenant the slightest guaranty of freedom of navigation. Not only is England left free to pursue her long-established naval policy, but she has with characteristic British forehandedness set about the business of securing for herself the same relative supremacy of the air that she has long had of the seas, after having first acquired by one means or another pretty much everything in the way of territories there was left on earth of which she was not already possessed. And trust her to keep them, league or no league! Nothing that has once passed under her domination has ever passed out again, save and except this country of ours. Then she further fortifies herself by obtaining six votes in the assembly as against any other nation's one, and finally gives to her associates assurances of her most disinterested and distinguished consideration.

France got, if not what she wanted, at least all she could before she would listen to the talk of the league. She very properly claimed Alsace-Lorraine and the Saar Basin. Her faith in its efficacy is fairly well evidenced by her demand for a separate treaty, which binds us to come to her defense in case of an attack. This treaty, upon her insistence, stipulates that neither Great Britain nor the United States is to be released from this obligation except by the unanimous consent of the council of the league, and since France is a member of the council it becomes in effect a guaranty in perpetuity.

Japan made sure of her generous portion before yielding her objection. Shantung was given her as the price of her participation—as immoral and unholy a bargain as ever was made, the permanency of which this country piously guarantees when it becomes a party to the covenant.

Italy gets added territory and invites an early interference by the league through D'Annunzio's seizure of Fiume. The most of this distribution of territory was arranged for by treaties the existence of which, it is said, was concealed from the United States until the moment came when she was asked to guarantee them their perpetuity.

Never was there a more selfish or more one-sided arrangement. It is this seizure and distribution of spoils that the United States is asked to confirm without question or scruple. Does anyone honestly think that this will either bring or preserve peace?

At Portland on September 15 the President called upon us to "forget the details of the treaty." Forget the details when it may almost be said that details are everything in a matter of this importance! How important are details? Ask the engineer who constructs a great bridge or an architect who designs a skyscraper. Ask the lawyer who writes contracts and wills as to whether he dare ignore details. Ask the statesmen who write laws. But, most of all, ask those men who have drafted treaties, because laws can be repealed by the voice of our own people, while treaties—this treaty—can not be changed without the consent of foreign governments. Forget the details! What would we think of the engineer who forgets to notice whether the signal is red or green? Of the switchman who forgets to close his switch as the train approaches? What would we think if the Pennsylvania Railroad gave up the slogan "Safety first" and substituted for that sign, posted everywhere throughout its system as a rule for its men to follow, "Forget the details"? Only a short time before the President called upon the Senate to forget the details, the unsoundness of his theory was proved in a manner all too tragic. The President's automobile was driven at the head of the procession at 45 miles an hour. The detail of "safety first" and the detail of adequate police protection and of a proper speed were all forgotten. Somebody followed the President's injunction to "forget the details." Those who were behind the President's car accepted his lead and tried to keep up. One car swerved too swiftly, and in an instant two members of the President's party had paid the great penalty for somebody's disregard of detail. The President might well substitute for his motto, "Forget the details," that much more conservative and helpful one, "Safety first."

The President is also telling the people that unless this treaty is ratified without adopting any of the amendments and reservations proposed by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations the world will be swept by the tide of anarchy. It is intimated that the people of Europe will rise and overthrow their governments and that this ruin will spread quickly to this country and destroy all that is best in America. Consider for a moment what this means. Does anybody think it possible that the people of England, of France, and of other countries will overthrow their governments because we of the United States insist on the right of absolute and unconditional withdrawal from the league? Will the British people rise in red rebellion because America insists on retaining control of her immigration laws, her tariff, her coastwise shipping? Will France split asunder if America insists on having as many votes in the league assembly as Great Britain? Does anybody think it even remotely possible that the peoples of Europe, having endured the Monroe doctrine for a century, will now destroy their own countries with their own hands because we intend to insist that the Monroe doctrine shall remain what it has ever been—an American policy, to be interpreted and applied by ourselves alone?

It so happens that in 1916 President Wilson told the country that a vote against him was a vote for war, while a vote for him was a vote for peace. The people of California and of Oregon, who have recently listened in such large numbers to the President's rounded periods and faultless rhetoric, appeared to believe this in 1916 and California voted for Wilson. Within a few months the course of events proved the President had misled those who believed him when he said that a vote for Hughes would be a vote for war and a vote for him a vote for peace. Now, the President, remembering how the country received his appeal in 1916, has gone out to sing the same enticing melody, the words set to the same tune, slightly changed to meet the requirements of the new occasion. He tells them that a vote for the Senate committee's report of reservations and amendments is a vote for universal anarchy, while a vote to ratify the treaty as it stands is a vote for world peace. I know of nothing that has transpired in the last three years to add anything to the President's qualifications as a prophet.

In his answer to a question addressed to him by the San Francisco's Labor Council on September 17 the President said that under article 11 there is set up "a forum to which all claims of self-determination which are likely to disturb the peace of the world, or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends, can be brought." And later said, in answer to another question, "My position on the subject of self-determination for Ireland is expressed in article 11 of the covenant." This is an explicit admission of the charge frequently made that article 11 gives the league jurisdiction over the internal affairs of member nations. It has been particularly declared that under such a covenant our Civil War could have been brought before the league council, and with no little danger that America, being concerned in the controversy and having no vote, might have been compelled to let the Southern States leave the Union. Is it not bad enough to try to get America to mix in every international quarrel on the face of the earth? Must she also embroil herself, waste her influence, weaken her prosperity, fill her own land with discord over questions which do not concern her but which relate to the internal troubles of other countries? However, it will be interesting to know whether the British Government agrees with the President in his interpretation of the covenant. If there be a disagreement, as I think more than likely, would we not better make plain now what it is we are agreeing to instead of sowing the seeds of discord for the future?

In San Francisco, on September 17, the President said that before we went into the war the Allies conferred in order to form an exclusive economic combination which should exclude those nations which had not participated in the war. He then continued: "And just so certainly as we stay out every market that can possibly be closed against us will be closed, so that if you merely look at it from the point of view of the material prosperity of the United States, we are under compulsion to stay in the partnership." Now, what sort of a threat is that? It is a threat that if the Senate refuses to ratify the covenant we will be boycotted in every market that is controlled not by our enemies but by our allies. No more astonishing statement has been made by anybody during the debate on the treaty.

Elsewhere the President has told his audiences that America won the war, that we saved Europe, and that we saved civilization. Now it seems that the President threatens us with an economic war by those very countries which we have at least helped to save unless we choose to continue in what he calls the "partnership." Is it possible that America is to be frightened into joining the league? Are Senators cowards that we should tremble under the threat of a boycott even though it be a world-wide boycott? What have we done to merit such treatment by our allies? Has President Wilson information on which to predicate such a statement? If true, it would seem that he is trying to get us into a league with our enemies, not with our friends. And if we should now yield to this threat of world-wide boycott and join the league in order to avoid it, what assurance have we that after so doing we may not again be threatened by a boycott from our associates unless we do as they desire? This statement by the President is nothing less than an admission that we must act under compulsion and fear, and if we do so once will we not thereby encourage further attempts at blackmail? For my part, whether the threat by the President is based on knowledge of the purposes of our allies which he gained in the peace conference or whether it be merely the hasty utterance of a fatigued and worried man, I for one will never submit to threat, nor will America. It must indeed be a losing battle when the President so far forgets himself as to try to intimidate the Senate and the American people who placed him where he is.

A condition which should give us much concern and which applies to us as it does to no other nation on the globe is the character of our population and the power for mischief at home that is afforded by it. Ours is to a considerable extent a polyglot population. In nearly every great city are large colonies of the nationals of other countries. Whole agricultural districts and even States are preponderantly populated by those who have comparatively recently come to us from other lands. No Senator will go further than I will in asserting that when these people pass through the gates of Castle Garden to take up residence amongst us they leave behind all allegiance to the governments from whence they came. Manifestly their duty and their loyalty are from that moment forward to this country only. But we must take things as they are and not as we should like them to be. Properly or improperly, the sympathies of these many peoples abide with the fatherland, even beyond their own generation. It is approximately true to say that the nationals of no two governments in Europe have lived on terms of amity at home. The hatred of Czech for Magyar, of Greek for Bulgar, of Italian for Jugo-Slav, of Irishman for Britain, is not left behind, but is brought with them to this country, and it is impossible that the United States should obey the mandate of the league to intervene in behalf of any one of them even as against the aggression of the other without arousing the resentment of that element of our population whose animosities toward those with whom their ancestors have been at daggers' points for generations, if not for centuries, have never been dispelled, with a result that can only be imagined since it can not be accurately gauged. Sentiment controls in most things. This is a condition that exists in no other country party to the covenant, for no other contains the varied elements that go to make up the whole as with us. Participation on behalf of any one of them would invite domestic unrest—perhaps upheaval and turmoil. That it will find its reflex in our politics is inevitable, and to what extent none can foretell. We shall be sowing tares on our own premises. Not the possibilities alone but the manifest certainties of such a division of sentiment in our midst must be apparent even to those who would close their eyes to them.

One of the simplest elements of common sense is the minding of one's own business and the keeping out of other people's business. This treaty with its league attachment provides for the systematic interference of the United States in the affairs of every other country. Every dispute between nations, every question and every quarrel, can be brought before the council of the league for consideration. These disputes will often be between those with whom we have lived in amity, and we shall be compelled to take sides as between friends, if any such are left to us, upon questions of whose merits we are not qualified to judge and which do not concern either American interests or American honor. We would be constantly turning friends into enemies, as every man does who takes sides in every quarrel he hears about. There can be no peace where there is international enmity.

Mr. President, when Aaron Burr had completed his term as Vice President and delivered his farewell address to the Senate over which he had presided he said:

> This body is growing in importance. It is here, if anywhere, that our country must ultimately find the anchor of her safety, and if the Constitution is to perish, which may God avert and which I do not believe, its dying agonies will be seen on this floor.

This declaration was both a prophecy and a prayer. The prophecy that in the Senate our country "must ultimately find the anchor of her safety" will find its fulfillment when this Senate exercises its constitutional duty toward the proposition now under consideration by rejecting it in its entirety of by so amending it as to remove every feature that threatens our future peace and tranquillity or which works for us the least departure from our established form of government or the impairment of our national ideals.

In my belief this treaty not only threatens but promises and compels both. The reservations proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations meet manifest needs as far as they go. I shall vote for every one of them as well as for the amendments that are before this body with the approval of a majority of the committee. Holding the views I do, it would be treason were I to vote to ratify the treaty in their absence. Nor do I mean to leave with my colleagues the impression that with them the treaty is acceptable, for it is not. There would still remain much to which I object and to which I have not been able to reconcile myself either as a Senator or as an American citizen who would secure to future generations the independence guaranteed us through the wisdom of the fathers.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in the remarks I am about to make touching the peace treaty and the league of nations; but, sir, I desire to emphasize the fact that the people of the United States want and are entitled above all else to have peace. The farmers, manufacturers, laborers, and financial men of the country, but, more than all others, the boys who did and suffered so much and who yet remain in military service, should be freed from the fetters that war necessarily imposes.

The country demands a prompt return to normal conditions. And what is true of the United States is true of all the earth. Peace, the best peace obtainable, but peace, just, world-wide, and at once, is the antidote of all antidotes for the poison of radical socialism and Bolshevism. It is the best remedy for industrial paralysis, unrest, poverty, and human misery following in the wake of the war.

So firmly am I of that opinion that I have hesitated to postpone the ratification of this treaty by so much as the few minutes consumed in this discussion, especially as the treaty and its plan for a league of nations has been carefully studied and voluminously discussed on this floor as well as in every parliament of the civilized world. And wherever the art of printing is known the main features of the treaty have been published and expounded to the utmost. Hence no one can hope to add any original thought or to throw fresh light at this late date effective for a better understanding of the subject.

I am sure that no one can change a single vote on this floor by further analysis and dissection of the myriad provisions of the treaty. Therefore it is clear the practical and wise course is to indulge the least possible discussion and take the quickest possible action. I am most reluctant to occupy the time of the Senate, but I feel that upon this topic of unprecedented world-wide importance every Senator should hold a definite position and make known unequivocally what that position is. And for my part I have never for an instant doubted the wisdom and duty of ratifying this treaty as submitted as promptly as possible and without amendments or reservations. No one seriously contends that an amendment would not recommit this treaty to the peace conference, thereby resulting in indefinite delay of peace. Even a reservation might have that effect.

I shall vote for no reservations unless convinced of the absolute necessity of so doing in order to save from failure the gigantic constructive principle involved. The treaty with its league of nations may be open to much well-taken criticism. The convincing argument in its favor is that as framed it is the best the world can get now. Its warmest friends do not claim for it perfection. Nor did the able patriots who framed the Constitution of the United States some 137 years ago claim perfection for that remarkable document. Nevertheless who can appraise the good resulting from our Constitution, imperfect though it was in the opinion of both its friends and enemies?

Our Constitution consists of a tissue of compromises, yet it has withstood the strain of civil war, numerous foreign wars, the presence and the abolition of slavery. It was violently attacked and inspired gloomy doubts on the part of able and unselfish men, who, like Senators here to-day opposing this treaty, desired their country's good. Still our Constitution is now accepted by the world as the great triumph of enlightened statesmanship, a model and an inspiration. Such reflections are reassuring.

Homely, everyday common-sense principles that are familiar enough, but which are perhaps lost sight of in the more minutely technical examination of the details of this treaty upon this floor, aside from the world-wide craving for peace, in my judgment commend this treaty to public favor.

Briefly, the ordinary man reasons very accurately that this treaty, like our own invincible and triumphant Constitution, is a result of compromises of widely conflicting views, and an assimilation of motives, interests, and forces that in extent girdle the earth.

Necessarily the treaty as framed does not wholly meet the judgment and wishes of anyone. It is not 100 per cent satisfying to any nation. Possibly that very fact is a recommendation. Perhaps it is well that no one nation is wholly satisfied with the treaty; otherwise, other nations might argue with truth that the treaty was wholly in the interest of such satisfied nation.

Like the Constitution of our land, the league of nations is a grand departure. A grand departure from the old accursed ways of war is what the world needs and should welcome.

Under our genius for self-government our Constitution has held us together as a nation upon the original principles while we have witnessed the rise and fall of the German Empire, and the fall of Turkey, Austria, Russia, and the Kings of France. Indeed ours is the oldest and has outlasted substantially every other system and form of government on earth. Where are the wise heads now who predicted that Constitution of ours would fail and fall?

The ideals expressed in that document, practical enough all now recognize, not so long ago were denounced as impossible, the work of dreamers, the surrender of sovereignty, State rights, and so forth. Indeed there is a similarity, striking and significant, between the reasons and arguments urged for rejecting our Constitution and those now heard in opposition to this treaty.

Of course we give up something, but we gain much. The evidence is everywhere at hand. Ludendorff's writings and other and better evidence overwhelming, convincing, assure us that with a strong league of nations in existence Germany would never have gone to war, and that no nation can or will ever again systematically and willfully plan to pounce upon and annihilate another country. No one disputes the conclusion that had Germany the remotest idea that both England and the United States would ever have entered the war against her the treaty with Belgium would not have been reduced to a mere scrap of paper, and millions of the flower of the youth of the world would not now lie buried in the fields of France.

This treaty is the first great and practical step since the creation toward accomplishing the peace of the world. Why reject so priceless, so practical, a remedy for the greatest and oldest earthly evil, even if it be less than perfect? It is surely better than the old way.

And why set a demoralizing example to the less enlightened nations of the world, nations prone to selfishness, by writing reservations in the treaty? Reservations made by one nation to just that degree and extent weaken or cancel the otherwise reciprocal obligations of the other nations, parties thereto. So that by a series of reservations it is clear that the strength of this compact will be dissipated, the treaty made ineffective. We then inevitably face a return to the dishonored system of arms piled upon arms, taxes upon taxes, warships added to warships, slaughter, deaths innumerable throughout the world—a return to the whole wretched and ancient competition to destroy. For if, under the very sting and impetus of the recent great battles, it took the peace conference, guided by the finest brains and characters existing, so many weary months to effect this present proposed agreement among nations, it seems perfectly idle to hope for a better or more enlightened document, if any at all, from a future conference. But I am convinced that, given a trial, this treaty, by its beneficent effect, will establish itself more firmly with the passage of time and lay a foundation, which may later approach perfection, for future successful effort to make war impossible.

The telegraph, wireless, aviation, steam, submarines, modern methods of communication and warfare have removed us as a Nation far afield from the Nation of 13 disorganized, struggling States, supporting a fringe of population along the Atlantic seaboard, during the time of George Washington.

In point of time in those days it was farther from Ticonderoga to Camden than now from the Potomac to the Rhine. With ships in every port, with the Panama Canal, the islands of the Pacific, an enormous foreign trade and foreign debt, with thousands of miles of coast line, with aggressive neighbors at our doors, in these modern days, we can no longer remain a hermit Nation. The oceans are avenues of access, possibly, for attack, and not insuperable and protecting barriers as when George Washington advised the newborn Nation to avoid entangling foreign alliances. The alliances of foreign countries will entangle us whether we will or no.

In self-defense we must become a military power, a great military power, on land and sea. The alternative is, by a compact such as we now consider, to end this barbarous competitive system of international preparation to grab, fight, slaughter.

It is impossible for me to understand how anyone can doubt that a league of nations must tend to insure international peace. It can not absolutely insure peace—a fact to be deplored with sorrow—but with the success of this first move man will be encouraged to wisdom and rise to unselfish accomplishment to complete in full the task here begun.

Forging the larger cannon, making the more deadly gas, the heavier ships, assembling the larger armies of men in slavery to arms, are the only methods and ideals seriously rooted heretofore in the minds of statesmen as a way to provide for national safety or international peace.

What a reproach to the minds and hearts of men that the ultimate determination of international controversy relied alone upon the exercise of brute force in personal combat, a method despised in private controversy since the lawgivers and judges first sat.

Why should we be willing to plunge the precious youth of our country in seas of blood, commit our Nation irrevocably to the enterprise of war, appeal to the barbaric remedy of force alone, condemn the nations of the earth to turn with hopeless eyes and heavy hearts away from our leadership as an advanced and merciful people, when this treaty, with its league of nations, offers a way to avoid war with safety and honor?

The hope of every youth, of every mother in the world, lies in this treaty. It is the soundest and strongest plan ever yet proposed to avoid wars. Future generations will rise up to extol its wisdom, to praise its results, and to call those blessed who planned and adopted this, the greatest document ever framed by fallible human hands. There is that about this treaty which appeals to the hearts and souls of men; that sheds light where for ages only darkness reigned; that promises an emancipation from war-made miseries, from arms, from destruction, an emancipation so complete and extensive as to quicken the imagination and to sustain our faith in the nobility of the world's leaders of the present day; and that makes us long to see its results for the morrow.

Why carp about Shantung?—a matter of slight comparative importance, which we wish were otherwise. The league saves China from the wolves in larger ways. Where could China go, what could she do without a league of nations? Why say we will be involuntarily drawn into war, when Congress, as always, alone can declare war?

Such criticisms merely give point and emphasis to the relatively trivial features found objectionable in the treaty as contrasted with the heroic proportions of its message of promise to a war-weary world.

POSTMASTER GENERAL AND CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on yesterday the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in speaking to Senate resolution 186, discussed the question of the Postmaster General's alleged activities in attempting to influence the ratings and the examinations of the Civil Service Commission.

I know that the Senator from Nebraska is a sincere believer in civil service, and I believe him to be thoroughly sincere in desiring to have an examination into the civil-service system and into the alleged activities of the Postmaster General. I want to say to him and to the Senate that I am not opposed to this resolution. On the contrary, I favor it; and yet I am quite confident that if the Senator from Nebraska had been familiar with the facts that have been brought out before the subcommittee of the Post Office Committee, which subcommittee has been holding hearings on this very subject for two or three weeks past, he would not have introduced the resolution in the first place, and he would not now be asking for an investigation.

The persons behind the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska are the same persons who are behind the investigation which is being conducted by this subcommittee. In the case that is being investigated by the subcommittee it is just another method of securing the same result.

I am going into the question before the subcommittee for a few moments for the purpose of showing what the facts are; in the first place, what the facts are as developed before the subcommittee in reference to the Civil Service Commission and the department itself; and, in the next place, the alleged activities of the Postmaster General.

In the case before the subcommittee—and the subcommittee is composed of Senators STERLING, FRANCE, PHIPPS, WALSH of Massachusetts, and myself—we have taken over 300 printed pages of testimony. A very thorough examination has been had. It arises over the appointment of a postmaster at a little place in North Carolina called Morehead City. The charge is that the Civil Service Commission first reported that a man by the name of Willis had received 80.31 per cent in an examination that had been held by the department for the postmastership of that place, and that the Democratic applicant, a Mr. Wade, had received 79.25 per cent. It was alleged that thereafter Mr. Wade, the second man on the list of eligibles, had made an application under the rules of the Civil Service Commission for a review of the ratings, that a review was granted by the commission, and upon that review the ratings were changed and Mr. Wade was given on business experience a rating of 3 per cent higher, and Mr. Willis was given a rating of about 1 per cent lower. The result of the reratings was that Mr. Wade, the Democratic applicant, received the highest rating on reexamination, and his nomination has been sent in to the Senate for confirmation, and upon the question of confirmation this committee is hearing the proof.

I think that fairly states the case.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator, although I think it would be just as well for the Senator to let me proceed, and then ask the questions just a little later. However, I will hear the Senator now.

Mr. FRANCE. Is it not true, however, that this appeal was granted contrary to the regulations of the Civil Service Commission, which provide that all appeals must be taken within 60 days?

Mr. McKELLAR. All I know is that the Civil Service Commission itself was before our committee; it is composed of two gentlemen, one a Democrat and the other a Republican; and both testified that under their rules a reexamination had been allowed, with the result stated.

Now, to proceed:

Mr. Willis thereupon laid charges before the Post Office Committee to the effect that he had been placed in the second position because of partisan politics; that the Postmaster General had intervened, and had used his influence to have these ratings changed.

What are the facts? I am going to give the facts very briefly. Mr. Willis simply testified about his marks. He then presented the marks of his opponent. He said that the ratings were remade without notice to him, which was true under the rules of the commission, as explained by Mr. Wales afterwards. It was then that the chairman of the subcommittee produced two other witnesses, and those two other witnesses were a Mr. Craven and a Mr. Galloway—Mr. Hermon W. Craven, I think, a Republican from Washington State, and Mr. Charles M. Galloway, a Democrat from South Carolina. It seems that last March the resignations of Mr. Craven and Mr. Galloway, one a Republican and the other a Democrat, were asked for by the President of the United States, and those resignations were handed in and accepted, and those two gentlemen are no longer members of the commission.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator know why those resignations were demanded?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not; but I will say to the Senator that one of the things that will undoubtedly come out from this examination will be the reason why those resignations were asked. Without knowing what the fact may develop, I feel quite sure that it will not be any such reason as was given by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] on yesterday.

Mr. Galloway was first called, and thereupon he said that his resignation had been requested last March, and it had been handed in, I believe, in July; that he had no personal knowledge of this case at all; that it was a routine matter, and that it had not come before him. That was all the evidence of Mr. Galloway that pertained to this case. But apparently that was not the reason why Mr. Galloway was summoned, for instantly he launched out into a repetition of the abuse that he had heretofore hurled through the newspapers at the Postmaster General and the Post Office Department in general.

Mr. Craven was then introduced, and it appeared from his testimony that he not only knew nothing about it, but that he was not even a member of the commission when the matter was reexamined and the reexamination marks made.

His resignation went in some time last March, and he had not any knowledge of the Morehead City case at all. And to show that it was a political matter, pure and simple, Mr. Craven at once launched out into abuse of the Postmaster General and of the administration generally.

That, with the exception of a few character and experience witnesses, was practically the proof. It all hinged on four answers—two given by each party, and I am going to read those answers right here and now so that Senators can see whether this commission did right or wrong. Mind you, Mr. Willis is the Republican applicant and Mr. Wade is the Democratic applicant. These statements I have in parallel columns, Mr. President, and I ask that they may be printed in parallel columns in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall read the answers of Mr. Willis and Mr. Wade as to their education and business experience, and under the order just made they are to appear in parallel columns.

These are the answers of Mr. Willis to those two questions on that subject:	The answers of Mr. Wade on the same subject are as follows:
No. 3.—Southern Express Co.; Mr. K. C. Barrett, Rocky Mount, N. C. Norfolk & Southern Ry., J. P. C. Davis, New Bern, N. C. Do. J. P. C. Davis, J. H. Crawford, New Bern, N. C. Do, G. H. Henderson, New Bern, N. C. Do, A. H. Webb, jr., Morehead City, N. C.	Questions 3 and 4.—While attending grammar and high school worked after school hours with my father and brother, who conducted a wholesale fish establishment. After entering A. & M. College, where I worked my way, I was employed as waiter in dining hall and did stenographic work for various professors of this institution. During vacation I continued to work with my father and brother.

Have acted in capacity as clerk with salary from $55 to $87.50 per month.	No salary connected with this job. In 1910 I opened up branch fish house in Raleigh, but closed this after a little over 18 months from time it was started. In 1912 I bought a weekly newspaper and job printing office, since which time I have conducted this business, the profits therefrom belonging to me. During the sessions 1915 and 1917 of the General Assembly of North Carolina I was pay clerk and assistant to principal clerk of the senate. Average time each session, 2 months and 15 days. Salary, $4 per day and mileage, amounting to $28.80.
No. 4.—Since 1911 have conducted business upon my own responsibility in the town of Morehead City, N. C. I have conducted a coal and wood business, a butcher business, and a café. My net earnings have averaged $1,200 per annum.	The net earnings of the Coaster Publishing Co., located in Morehead City, is owned by me. The net earnings amount to $1,200 to $1,500 annually. I employ four persons regularly, superintend them during working hours, and assist generally with the work of the office. Am editor and owner of the weekly newspaper, The Coaster.

It was upon those answers that this reviewing board, composed wholly of Republicans, came to the conclusion that Mr. Wade was entitled to a rating 3 per cent higher than that of Mr. Willis upon answers to the same questions. I submit that a mere reading of those answers in parallel columns is conclusive proof to any fair-minded man, any man not blinded by partisanship, that the reviewing board was right in making the rerating.

That brings me, Mr. President, to the next phase of the situation. Remember, it is being charged that undue influence has been exerted by the Postmaster General to bring about the appointment of a Democrat instead of a Republican. Who has passed upon these papers? Of course, it has been done by Republicans, because there is practically nobody else but Republicans in the Civil Service Commission. The Civil Service Commission has been composed of Republicans from the very beginning, in the largest measure. There were seven men who had to do with these examinations. Of the two original examiners who passed on the papers and gave Mr. Willis a slight lead over Mr. Wade, one was a Democrat and the other was a Republican. The reviewing board, composed of Mr. Yaden, Mr. Hesse, and Mr. Kumler, were all three Republicans.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. In one moment. Of the two commissioners who confirmed the result, one was a Republican and one was a Democrat. So that of the seven men who have gone over these papers and given to the commission and to the department and to the country their best judgment on the matter, five of them were Republicans and two of them were Democrats.

Now, when you gentlemen on the other side attack this kind of a proceeding you are attacking your own friends in your own party. Surely they would not do you a wrong in a question of partisanship. Now I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not believe that the facts he has just narrated demonstrate that although officials in the Civil Service Commission are mostly Republicans, they are fair, not using partisan influence in their official capacity?

Mr. McKELLAR. I would not be here, as I am, defending them against the unjust attacks of the Senator from Nebraska on yesterday if I thought that they were using partisan influence.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Nebraska has made no attack on the Civil Service Commission employees, and the Senator from Tennessee can not point to a line or sentence where I made such an attack.

Mr. McKELLAR. On yesterday the Senator from Nebraska stated that the Civil Service Commission was composed of such men, and these commissioners were such men, that they were allowing the alleged insidious hands of the Post Office Department to overreach them and overcome them and put Democrats in office instead of Republicans. That is the statement of the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. On the other hand, Mr. President, I was defending a Democratic member of the Civil Service Commission because he would not permit the Postmaster General to make a political machine out of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator was taking Mr. Galloway, a Democrat, and Mr. Craven, a Republican, who had been discharged, and he was defending these discharged employees of the Civil Service Commission and making an attack upon the rest of those who are now in control of the Civil Service Commission and who have furnished these very ratings.

Mr. NORRIS. I know the Senator does not want to make a misstatement——

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not blame the Senator for withdrawing from that position, because I say to him, and to gentlemen on the other side, you have in this case a perfectly dead horse. You can not get along with it. You are in a position where you can not turn it loose without receding and you can not go on with it, because you can not defend it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not want to make a misstatement in regard to my position on yesterday.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; I do not.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not at any time attack the Civil Service Commission, and the Senator can not point to a word that I said that was an attack on them or any of their employees. I challenge him to turn to the RECORD—and I have not changed it—and point out a single charge that I made against that commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Here is what the Senator says in his resolution:

> Whereas it is currently reported in the public press that the Postmaster General has been actively engaged in interfering with the work of the Civil Service Commission in relation to the examination and certification by said commission of eligibles from which postmasters are to be selected, and is attempting to control said examinations and certifications with a view of securing partisan political appointments to such places; and
> Whereas it is also reported that in carrying out such plan the President has demanded the resignation of certain members of the Civil Service Commission; and
>
> Whereas one of said commissioners, in resigning his place, has issued a public statement in which the foregoing facts are in substance charged: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate such charges and reports, and report to the Senate, first, whether the Postmaster General has used the power of his office to control the action of the Civil Service Commission in such examinations and certifications.

Is it possible that if the Civil Service Commission has permitted the Postmaster General to control its action as to examinations and certifications made by it, it is not at fault? I can not conceive, Mr. President, anything more infamous, anything more reprehensible, than for the commission to permit any outsider to interfere with its examinations and certifications, and if it has done it, as charged in this resolution, and if the Senator's statement in the resolution is true, the other two commissioners' resignations ought to be asked for at once.

Listen to this: The only difference the Senator makes is that he does not ask the penalties to be visited upon his Republican friends on the commission. He asks that the Postmaster General be dealt with, but the other side of the controversy, to wit, the Civil Service Commission, that has been permitting itself to be overreached and overridden by the Postmaster General, according to this resolution, are to go without any condemnation, under the Senator's resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that is a charge against the Civil Service Commission and their employees?

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been published in every newspaper in the country. It is a charge, and every other man I have heard say anything about it believes it is a charge.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator like the resolution better if it were enlarged so as to investigate them as well as the Postmaster General?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; and I will tell you why.

Mr. NORRIS. If he would, I would be glad to have him suggest an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will, if it is necessary. But let me say this to the Senator: I am glad the Senator has given his sanction to the two present members of the commission, as he has done just now. Before the committee that is hearing this case, Mr. Morrison, the present Democratic president of the commission, and Mr. George R. Wales, the present Republican commissioner, both appeared, and the question contained in this resolution was read to both of these gentlemen, and they both indignantly denounced it as untrue. The Senator from Nebraska is in an unfortunate position with his resolution. If the statement that is made in it is true, then the Senator's belated defense of the commission can not possibly stand. But I am here to say that in my judgment two members of the commission, one a Democrat and the other a Republican, are both fair men. I happened to serve in the House with Mr. Morrison, of Indiana, an honest, straight, fair, just man, who would not permit any man to overreach him, who would not be controlled by any man in the world; in my judgment he is far too intelligent and honest for anyone to overreach him. I want to say as to Mr. Wales, the other commissioner, the testimony shows that Mr. Wales is a Vermont Republican, recommended by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], one of the best men in the Senate, as straight as a string.

Mr. Wales himself is an absolutely straight, impartial man—fair-minded man. There can be no question about his politics. There can be no question about his ability. He has been with the commission for 25 years. He is a faithful and honored employee. He has testified in no uncertain language that the statement made in the resolution which was introduced by the Senator from Nebraska is wholly without foundation, and surely he knows. No one has overreached him, and no one will overreach him.

Now, we have this remarkable state of affairs——

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Both these commissioners are new. They have been in office a comparatively short length of time.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true as to Mr. Morrison, but Mr. Wales has held honorable positions in the office of the Civil Service Commission for 25 years.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, he was chief examiner; but will the Senator say that these men had any knowledge of the various things that happened before they became commissioners? As long as they have been there as commissioners their answer would be applicable, but it would not apply to the time before they went in.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator asks that question. Mr. Morrison did not so testify, because he has been there only a short time; but Mr. Wales, as I said, has grown up in the commission; he has been there for 25 years, and he has held practically every position under the commission except that of president or secretary. He has held them all. He has been an examiner; he has been a law clerk.

Mr. NORRIS. How long has he been commissioner?

Mr. McKELLAR. He has been commissioner only a few months or a few weeks, as the case may be, but there is no man in the commission or out of it that is so familiar with it. He was familiar with the facts in this case when I asked him questions. He is chief examiner, and as such has more to do with passing upon the qualifications of applicants for office than any other man in this country, in the commission or out of it. Mr. Wales said that during the whole six years of the present administration, except in due course of business in written letters, written asking for reviews in the way prescribed by the commission, there has never been any attempt by the Post Office Department to influence him in the ratings or influence anyone under him in the ratings.

The remarkable part about the thing is this—and I want to challenge you gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber right now that you can not get along on those facts, because the ratings were changed, as I said before, by a reviewing board composed of Mr. Hesse, a Republican from Pennsylvania, who frankly admits he is a Republican. They were passed on by Mr. Yaden, coming from east Tennessee, who frankly admits he is a Republican, and by Mr. Kumler, a third member of the reviewing board, who frankly admits he is a Republican. I say a charge is made that these three Republicans have joined in allowing themselves to be overridden and influenced and overreached and tampered with by the Post Office Department or the Postmaster General is thoroughly without foundation under the evidence and can not be upheld for a moment. I want to say, as I said before, that you gentlemen are just taking the wrong tack, you have a position which you can not defend, and I do not believe it will be defended when the case comes up. So much for that.

This very remarkable fact occurred in examining this record. Of course when it came to Mr. Craven, the Republican member whose resignation had been asked for, and Mr. Galloway, the Democratic member whose resignation had been asked for, the question came as to why and how they had taken this attitude toward the Post Office Department, and here is what Mr. Koons testified. Mr. Koons is First Assistant Postmaster General. He, and not the Postmaster General, has had to do with the whole of this matter; he conducts all the negotiations between the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission. He is fair and frank about it. He is an honest man, absolutely, and one of the best and most efficient officers in the whole Government.

Mr. Koons was asked this question: "Mr. Koons, have you ever had any conversation with Mr. Craven and Mr. Galloway in reference to the Post Office Department's activities with the Civil Service Commission?" He said, "Yes; I have." "When did you have it, Mr. Koons?" He said, "Why, immediately after the resignations of these two gentlemen were asked for by the President they came down to see me and said, substantially, 'Now, we have always gotten along with your department.'" By the way, these two gentlemen were in the room of the committee when Mr. Koons made these statements, and the statements were not denied by them. Mr. Koons said, in substance, "They came down to see me and said that the President had asked for their resignations and 'We want you to help us. We have always gotten along well with your department; we have had some little differences occasionally, but they were purely formal and official, and we know that you feel like helping us out. Won't you go to the President and ask the President to withdraw his request for our resignations?'"

That was the attitude of these two gentlemen who are now abusing the department. That was their attitude when the matter first came up and when they wanted help. They induced Mr. Koons to go in to Mr. Burleson and introduce them to Mr. Burleson, or to confer with Mr. Burleson, and they made the same statements to Mr. Burleson and asked him to intercede with the President. Mr. Burleson said it was out of his department, and he declined to do it; and immediately these same gentlemen, who had protested to be the friends of the department and to work in harmony with it, began to abuse it in the newspapers.

As I said before, I wholly disagree with Mr. Burleson and with his policies toward the employees under him. I totally disagree with Mr. Burleson in his view that the Post Office Department ought to be made a money-making machine. I do not think that was its purpose when created. I disagree with him on many matters. But when it comes to an action of this kind, without any foundation in fact at all, being taken at the behest of two men whose resignations have been asked for and given and accepted, I say it is absolutely indefensible and no fair-minded man can criticize the Postmaster General or the Post Office Department under such circumstances as that. Mr. Burleson may be unpopular, as many of you Republicans insist, but he is an honest man and he is entitled to a fair, square deal.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to what has been done. They made it appear and the newspapers have made it appear and the Senator from Nebraska has made it appear here yesterday that in certain cases that were passed upon showed that the Postmaster General was undertaking to influence the Civil Service Commission.

I want to call attention first to the order. Mind you, this is not the Civil Service Commission:

> The position of postmaster at offices of the first, second, and third classes is not within the classified civil service, and the civil-service rules and regulations do not apply to such appointments, consequently the selection of persons for nominations to fill vacancies therein is strictly an Executive function, and it is not within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, House of Representatives, to inquire into such nominations. If the recommendation of the Postmaster General, made (with the approval of the President) in 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918, that these positions be by law covered under the classified service, had been followed, the committee would now have full jurisdiction in the premises. But, notwithstanding these repeated recommendations, earnestly insisted upon, no action has been taken, and as the President desired that these positions be as far removed from partisan politics as possible, he has taken all action within his power to take.

Mind you, the Postmaster General recommended that these offices be put under the classified civil service and it was not done; and the President, believing in the civil service and standing by it, issued an order that he would hold examinations himself through the Civil Service Commission and appoint the highest man, and that has been done. Let us see whether it has been done fairly and justly. The Senator from Nebraska singled out one case, and I will call his attention to it in a few minutes. But let us see what has been done in the great majority of cases:

> This order simply provides a means by and through which the President secures information for his own guidance in selecting suitable persons for nomination to the Senate.
>
> At the request of the President, the Civil Service Commission holds examinations and rates the papers and certifies the register and eligibles to this department—

That is, the Post Office Department—> for the consideration of the President, this being the only connection the Civil Service Commission has with these appointments.

> Notwithstanding the fact that the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, House of Representatives, would have no jurisdiction in this matter, which is purely an Executice function, the Postmaster General will gladly furnish the information in the utmost detail just as requested by the resolution, so that the facts which have been so grossly misrepresented may be known to the public. To furnish the detailed information required by the resolution will, however, require an immense amount of work, which will take the limited number of clerks that can be assigned to the same several weeks to complete.
> The records of the department since the Executive order of March 31, 1917—

I call the particular attention of the Senator from Nebraska to this:

> Number of nominations from eligible register, 1,267.
> Number of nominations of first eligible, 1,188, or 93.7 per cent.
> Number of nominations of other than first eligible because of death or refusal of first eligible to accept, 26, or 2 per cent.

Number of cases where other than first eligible was nominated because of character or residence of No. 1, 35, or 2.8 per cent.

Number of nominations of other than first eligible for various reasons such as health of No. 1—tuberculosis, skin disease—etc., 18, or 1.5 per cent.

Number of cases still in the hands of the Civil Service Commission, 466.

Number of cases before the President for consideration awaiting determination of the application of the act of July 11, 1919, 35.

Number of cases certified by the Civil Service Commission but still under consideration by the department, 285.

These figures show conclusively that the charges so frequently made that the Postmaster General is violating the Executive order of March 31, 1917, are unfair, unjust, and without foundation of fact. In this connection may I assert with as much emphasis as possible that in no case has the Postmaster General or the First Assistant Postmaster General, under whose immediate supervision these cases are handled, by letter or by word spoken, attempted to control or influence the action of the Civil Service Commission in the selection of any individual to fill any vacancy occurring in one of these positions, but have at all times observed the Executive order in letter and in spirit.

Mr. President, these facts show that over 400 post-office cases have been submitted for review to this Republican reviewing board, every member of which was a Republican. The ratings in 4 cases out of over 400 cases have been changed. There have been 400 applications, of which 4 have been changed, and largely because of those 4 changes we have here a resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska demanding that the Postmaster General be impeached, because a Republican reviewing board has changed 4 cases out of 400 applications. If Senators on the other side of the aisle can get along on that proposition, they will do better than I think they can. It is idle, it is ridiculous. They are simply undertaking to injure these men in the Civil Service Commission—and, by the way, let me talk about that just a minute.

Do you know how many Democrats there are in the Civil Service Commission? There is one member of the commission, one law clerk, and one assistant examiner who are the only three lone Democrats that I have been able to find in the commission service. Do you know how many Republicans there are? The Republicans have had two members of the commission, they have had the secretary of the commission—and, by the way, we have had six years of Democratic rule, too, you will remember, and during all those six years the Republicans have predominated until the last few months.

The chief examiner is a Republican; the secretary of the commission is a Republican; all of the examiners except one are Republicans; and yet you gentlemen are complaining because the Republican reviewing board and the Republican on the commission have changed the ratings of 4 Democrats out of over 400! I have known the Senator from Nebraska for a long time; he is a very fair man; and I do not believe that under those circumstances, when he learns the facts disclosed in the hearing before the Post Office Committee—and here are 400 pages of them, and I am going to send them over to the Senator from Nebraska for his examination—I do not believe he will push an investigation of that kind which puts his own political friends on the commission—and I mean nothing discourteous by that, because so far as I have been able to see they are fair and just men—and I believe the Senator from Nebraska will agree that they ought not be put in an awkward position. Everyone of them has decided the case against the Senator in the previous investigation. When the matter comes up before the Civil Service Committee you are going to find all of your Republican friends on the commission telling you that you are wrong about it, for you are wrong about it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish again to remind the Senator from Tennessee that he is not correctly stating my position.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, I am glad I am not.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is putting up a straw man and knocking it down. I have made no attack, and I make no attack, on the Civil Service Commission or its employees; and I again challenge the Senator to find in my remarks on yesterday anything which may bear the construction which he is placing upon them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I leave it to fair-minded men. The Senator's resolution charges that the Civil Service Commission has permitted the Postmaster General to interfere with its duties. Let me read it. It charges——

Mr. NORRIS. Commence at the beginning.

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait a minute.

Mr. NORRIS. Read it all again.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to read it all again. The resolution, in part, reads:

Whether the Postmaster General has used the power of his office to control the action of the Civil Service Commission in such examinations and certifications.

If he has, the Civil Service Commission certainly are grievously at fault and they ought not to occupy their positions. But I am defending them and say they have not permitted the Postmaster General to interfere with their duties, and that the testimony shows that the Postmaster General has not attempted to do so. In the name of Mr. Morrison, the splendid Democratic member of the commission, and of Mr. Wales, the equally splendid Republican member of the commission, I challenge any member of the subcommittee—and one of them is present now, and there was another one here a few moments ago—to say if George R. Wales and Martin Morrison, in their testimony and in their demeanor before the committee, did not fully justify the estimate which I have placed upon them.

Mr. President, there are one or two other matters about which I wish to talk for just a moment which were referred to on yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska. One is the Greenup case at Bremerton, Wash. It was a case which was brought to the attention of the Assistant Postmaster General and of the committee by Mr. Craven, of Washington, the member of the commission whose resignation was asked for. The postmaster at Bremerton had died or resigned, and an examination was had. The Republican examiners held the examination and reported in favor of a man by the name of Greenup as having the highest rating. As soon as their report came in to the Postmaster General, or rather to the Assistant Postmaster General—the Postmaster General had nothing in the world to do with these matters; Mr. Koons looked after them, and I do not suppose the Postmaster General ever heard of any of these cases—when the name of Mr. Greenup was sent in as the highest eligible, and whom the President was to appoint under the rule, the Post Office Department wrote a letter, which is in the record, stating that Mr. Greenup had been assistant postmaster at that place until a few months previously; that he had embezzled the Government's funds; that he had been indicted for that offense; that he had pleaded guilty to the indictment and had been fined $150 by the Federal court for embezzling the funds of the Government. Under those circumstances the Post Office Department declined to appoint Mr. Greenup and asked for another examination.

Mr. Craven sent out an inspector to ascertain whether or not the statements were true; he did not take the word of the Post Office Department; but really undertook in his testimony to defend the certification of Mr. Greenup, as will be found. I asked "Why, is it posible, Mr. Craven, that you were not willing to thank the Post Office Department of the Government for calling your attention to such a matter?" Finally, after a vigorous cross-examination, he admitted that this man ought not to have been appointed; and he was not appointed. Is there anything wrong about that? Ought the Postmaster General to be impeached for not submitting to a certification like that?

Something was said about a Texas case, and I have a letter that was sent to Chairman TOWNSEND, of the Post Office Committee, to which I desire to call attention. This letter was written by Mr. Koons. If I have made a mistake about the Bremerton post office, I shall be obliged to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] if he will correct me, as the post office is in his State.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, Mr. President, I have had very little connection with the post offices in my State during the last eight years, and I know nothing about the facts in connection with that case.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to hear the Senator make that statement. I knew that he would not defend an appointment of that kind. The letter to which I have referred reads:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, August 20, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR TOWNSEND: I have your letter of the 18th instant requesting the department to furnish for the use of the committee all inspectors' reports regarding the postmaster at Willis, Tex., as well as any charges which have been preferred against the nominee for postmaster at Willis, Mr. Charles F. Butts.

In reply you are advised that the postmaster at Willis died several months ago, and it is therefore assumed that you do not desire any inspectors' reports relating to his record. As a result of the postmaster's death an examination was held by the Civil Service Commission for postmaster at Willis, as a result of which Mr. Charles F. Butts was certified as the highest eligible for appointment. Charges having been preferred against Mr. Butts, an investigation thereof was made by a post-office inspector, and as the report indicated that the advisability of his appointment was questionable it was submitted in accordance with the usual practice in these cases to the Civil Service Commission for review, for the purpose of determining whether his name should be eliminated from the eligible register. The inspector's report dated March 15, 1919, a copy of the department's letter to the commission transmitting the report, and the commission's reply dated May 14, 1919, are inclosed herewith. You will observe that the commission concluded that there was no ground for cancellation of the application of Mr. Butts. In view of this report of the commission, the department could take no action in the matter in view of the provisions of the Executive order of March 31, 1917, other than to submit his name to the President for appointment.

These papers are furnished at your request for the confidential information of the committee, and with the request that they be returned as soon as possible to the department.

Very sincerely,

J. C. KOONS,
Acting Postmaster General.

Here was one of the 396 cases out of the 400 that the reviewing board upon which attacks have been made failed to change. What was the result? The Post Office Department sent the name in to the President, it being the first name on the eligible list. The President sent the name to the Senate, and the Senate rejected Mr. Butts because, it is supposed, of his character as shown by the department investigation. That is the situation; all you have to do is to examine into the cases. Whatever else may be said about Mr. Burleson, in the light of this evidence, you can not charge him with having debauched the Civil Service Commission. In the first place, he has not done so and has not tried to do so, and, in the second place, I say that the two civil-service commissioners are such men as can not be debauched by Mr. Burleson or by any other man. They are men of the highest character and standing.

Incidentally I might say that seven men have passed upon the Morehead City case, five Republicans and two Democrats. Five of these gentlemen, four Republicans and one Democrat, have testified that the ratings as changed were proper ratings. Senators on the other side have a majority; they can defeat Mr. Wade, who has been nominated under these circumstances, but whenever they do they turn down their own partisans on the commission, members of their own party who have testified and sworn that these ratings were correct.

The Senator from Nebraska says he made no attack upon these gentlemen and that they bear good reputations. In that I cordially agree, and if they have not done any wrong in this case I know the Senator from Nebraska, honest and honorable man as he is, will uphold the members of his party when they have done no wrong.

Mr. President, as I have heretofore said, the truth of the matter is that the proposed investigation is purely political. Some Senators on the other side of the Chamber have thought that this was an opportune time to "jump on" a member of the President's Cabinet. The resolution was offered and I voted for the resolution, for I court the utmost investigation of these matters, but when they are investigated Senators will be absolutely convinced that the Civil Service Commission is an honorable, upright, and splendid body, and that the Postmaster General has not undertaken to override or overreach that commission. I have tried very strenuously before our subcommittee to get that committee, before which these charges have been made, to permit Mr. Burleson to come before the committee and be heard in his own defense, but up to this time the subcommittee has refused to hear him. It has heard elaborate charges against him, but will not permit him to be heard in his own defense. The charges are therefore confessedly purely political, and, as I believe from the evidence, without foundation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has been engaged now for an hour in putting up straw men and knocking them down. He has enjoyed it, and I certainly have no objection. He has continually attempted to convey the impression that the resolution I have introduced is an attack on the Civil Service Commission, and then he mentions names of two members of the Civil Service Commission now in office and says they are high-minded, able men. With that I agree. I happen to have served in the House with the Democratic member, and I have a very high regard for him. I know that Mr. Wales, the other member, has been in civil-service work nearly all his mature life. I do not think he has any politics, although he is designated as a Republican. I have made no attack on either of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the statement the Senator made about Mr. Wales?

Mr. NORRIS. I said that he had been engaged in the civil-service work nearly all his mature life; I did not think he had any real politics. He has been out of politics ever since he has been connected with the commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am always for defending a good man, even if he is a Republican; and I wish to say about Mr. Wales that he is such a good Republican that when it comes to important national elections, as I am reliably informed, he pays his own way, goes to Vermont like the gentleman and Republican that he is, and votes the Republican ticket. He is that kind of a Republican, and that is perfectly proper.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to hear that. That certainly is in his favor and is quite a good recommendation for him. But, Mr. President, the idea I want to convey—and the Senator from Tennessee will agree with me in it I know—is that during all the time Mr. Wales has been connected with the Civil Service Commission there never has been, so far as I have been able to determine or hear, any charge made against him that he was ever trying to use his position for the sake of getting a party advantage for anybody. In other words, he has been enforcing the law and holding the examinations as he believed to be right, regardless of politics. The Senator seems to think that I am fighting his confirmation in the Senate. I know of no objection to his confirmation. I have none. I am not personally acquainted with Mr. Wales. I know only some of his work, and know him somewhat by reputation, and I do not know anything against him. I never have made a charge against him; and regardless of the eloquence of the Senator from Tennessee he can not construe this resolution into such a charge or as to Mr. Morrison, either. The things that I have complained of have not taken place under these commissioners.

The Senator from Tennessee mentioned some cases that I know nothing about. I have no doubt that he can find dozens of other cases where justice was probably done. It is a remarkable fact, however, that in the action of the Post Office Department on these examinations, whenever a Democrat—at least, the right kind of a Democrat—is the eligible, he is nominated; his name is sent in. An investigation will show, I think—I have not made it—that a large majority of the cases that have been held up are cases where Republicans were at the top of the list in the examinations held by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator made any examination as to the politics of the majority of the postmasters that have been appointed in his own State under this order since it was made?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not examined any of them except those which have been brought to my attention by some contest; and in every instance in those cases the objection by the Post Office Department to the man selected by the Civil Service Commission has been urged against a Republican.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is not that perfectly natural, when you come to think of the fact, that the examiners who pass on the qualifications of all these applicants are all Republicans, that the reviewing board is composed of Republicans, that the secretary of the Civil Service Commission is a Republican, and that one of the two members of the commission itself is a Republican?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it remarkable at all?

Mr. NORRIS. No; that is not remarkable, after the statement of the Senator from Tennessee that these Republicans have been doing such wonderfully good work and that he has no complaint to make against their work. Now, I do not care, as far as I am concerned, whether the successful ones belong to one party or to the other. If we are in earnest about enforcing this law, we must entirely disregard political affiliations in the selection of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I, of course, feel sure that the Senator wants to be fair about this; and my complaint is not that the Senator does not want to be fair, but that the Senator has not investigated. For instance, in his own State I am reliably informed that since this order has gone into effect a majority of the first eligibles that have been reported and a majority of the postmasters appointed and confirmed in Nebraska since this order has gone into effect were Republicans.

Mr. NORRIS. Where did the Senator get his information?

Mr. McKELLAR. I got the information from the department.

Mr. NORRIS. From the Post Office Department?

Mr. McKELLAR. I did.

Mr. NORRIS. How did the Post Office Department find it out?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. If they were doing their duty as the order and the law intended them to do it, they would not know the politics of these men. Why is the Postmaster General going out and investigating the politics of men who are applicants for post offices when we have this great, big, broad order that says we are going to eliminate politics from the consideration of the entire question?

I have not investigated in any case except where there has been a contest in my State, and I gave some illustrations of it yesterday. I should like to have heard the Senator from Tennessee give his opinion as to whether or not I, as a Member of the Senate, and part of the appointing body under the Constitution, having an official duty to perform, had a right to go into the Post Office Department down here, presided over by the man he has eulogized so much, and ask to see the papers and the evidence where there was a contest. I have not heard the Senator say anything about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the Senator want to know?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is not only the Senator's privilege and not only the Senator's right, but I think it is the Senator's duty, where any of his constituents'——

Mr. NORRIS. I knew the Senator would say that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. Where any of his constituents' interests are at stake I think it is his duty to inquire about it, and if he does not know about their politics, he ought to inquire about that. I will say that if the Senator wants my opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not go as far as the Senator. If we are going to keep them out of politics, then we ought not to go into the partisan question, and I am one who believes in keeping them out of politics. I have believed in it for a great many years. I believed in it when my party had control over the post offices, and I tried to bring about a law that would put them under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. I favor it yet. There never was a Member of Congress or a citizen of this country who felt better than I did when President Wilson issued that order taking them out of politics; and if the administration had only carried it out in good faith there would have been no complaint from me. That order was issued on the 31st day of March, 1917. Now, you will remember that the order provides that when there are vacancies the Postmaster General shall call upon the Civil Service Commission to hold examinations, and although that order was issued on the 31st day of March, 1917, the first examinations under a call of the Post Office Department took place in April, 1918. It was more than a year after the order was issued before the Postmaster General even tried to put it into effect. Do you think the President could have been in ignorance of this neglect of duty of the Postmaster General? If he wanted his order obeyed and carried out in good faith, would he not have compelled action sooner than this?

The Civil Service Commission has been issuing statements every month for the benefit of those who want to take the examinations. There is a different examination held in post offices where the salary is $2,400 or more. According to those statements, the total number of post offices paying more than $2,400 salary for which examinations have been held from April, 1918, the date of the first examination, up to and including June, 1919, was 146, and out of that total of 146 there have been only 66 nominations—that is, for the important offices. There is more desire to control them than those that are lower down. The Senator has given some statistics about unimportant post offices. I know nothing about it. I am willing to accept it. Nobody claims that in every post office an attempt is made to control the action of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. President, these post offices with a salary of more than $2,400 have, as I said, a different system of examination. They are not, of course, under the civil service, because, as I said yesterday, it was impossible to place them there completely. Even Congress could not do that by law; it would be unconstitutional, because the President has the power to appoint postmasters to presidential offices. So that in the examinations held for postmasters drawing a salary of more than $2,400 there was at first quite a contest in the commission. Mr. McIlhenny, the chairman of the commission—and, by the way, I understood the Senator to say that this commission had two Republicans and one Democrat. It has had two Democrats and one Republican ever since Mr. Wilson was President.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; Mr. McInhenny and Mr. Craven were both Republicans, and Mr. McIlhenny went out just a short time ago. I am sure the Senator has not looked into this question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is of very little importance, but my understanding is that Mr. McIlhenny is a Democrat.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; oh, no. He was appointed by President Roosevelt, and he is a Republican.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, well, President Roosevelt appointed Democrats, and there was a good share of the time that President Taft was President when the commission was composed of two Democrats and one Republican.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, there never was any question about Mr. McIlhenny's politics. The Senator had better look into this matter, because the entire commission is Republican.

Mr. NORRIS. As I say, I do not care whether he is a Democrat or a Republican. I understood that he was a Democrat. Probably I got that from the fact that when he got into trouble with the other two commissioners, and they could not get along for a while, there is not any doubt that Burleson was trying to get him out, and he could not get him out until they found a nice place to put him, and President Wilson put him in another job drawing $10,000 a year salary, where he is nicely situated now. I supposed, therefore, he was a Democrat. At least it is safe to say he was a Wilson supporter. His reward shows that.

As I said, in these more important offices, where the salary is $2,400 or more, the examination is to a great extent under the control of the Post Office Department. The other two commissioners did not want to hold it in that way, but Mr. McIlhenny did. The Republican, Mr. Craven, and the Democrat, Mr. Galloway, wanted the Civil Service Commission to hold these examinations entirely without the assistance of the inspectors of the Post Office Department, but the chairman of the commission, Mr. McIlhenny objected, and it was put up to the President to decide, and he agreed with the chairman, so that to quite an extent the President, by this decision, took the offices of the highest class out from under the control of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator understands that quite a majority of all of the district inspectors who make these examinations with the inspector from the Civil Service Commission are Republicans. Just take my case.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care for that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know the Senator does not.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not claimed that they are doing anything wrong, or that they are violating the law, or that they are not enforcing it in good faith.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Senator is, indirectly.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator is not.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is trying to make me do that, but I will not.

Mr. President, I have here an article printed in the Philadelphia Press that gives such a good description of the difficulty that first arose down there in the Civil Service Commission between the chairman and the other two members, and the methods the Postmaster General had taken to take these examinations partly out from under the control of the Civil Service Commission, that I ask that it may be printed as a part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Press of August 28, 1919.]

SENSATIONS SEEN IN CIVIL-SERVICE QUIZ; BURLESON ACCUSED—COMMISSION "GREATLY ABUSED," CHARGE—WILSON SUPPRESSES HOT NOTE FROM GALLOWAY—GET FACTS OF SHAKE-UP—"COLLUSION BETWEEN UNITED STATES POSTAL INSPECTORS AND CIVIL-SERVICE AGENTS GENERAL," HINT.

(By Charles R. Michael.)

WASHINGTON, August 27.

A sensation is promised in the investigation now being made by civil-service advocates against the conduct of the Civil Service Commission, which, it is alleged, has been greatly abused by Postmaster General Burleson. Commissioner Galloway, it is asserted, has written a letter to President Wilson which makes very serious charges against Mr. Burleson. This letter has been suppressed.

Although the principals in the matter are reluctant to give out information, little by little, from various sources, the facts with reference to the recent shake-up in the United States Civil Service Commission are coming to light.

Because of certain information that had come to President Wilson with reference to the Civil Service Commission he invited Commissioners Galloway and Craven to the White House for an interview on July 5, 1917. The President deemed the matters that were discussed of such importance that he requested the two commissioners to call for a second conference on July 9, 1917. The facts relating to the official conduct of Mr. McIlhenny, chairman of the commission, already in the possession of the President, and the facts presented to him by the two commissioners, the one a Democrat and the other a Republican, were of such a nature that a short time after these interviews Postmaster General Burleson, speaking with authority, informed Galloway and Craven that McIlhenny was going to be removed just as soon as a man could be found to take his place. Soon after Burleson offered McIlhenny's place to Victor Murdock, but Murdock turned it down for a place on the Federal Trade Commission. Then Burleson offered the place to Robert W. Woolley, who preferred an appointment as Interstate Commerce Commissioner.

HELD FOR $10,000.

But, after all, Mr. McIlhenny did not go. He stayed for 18 months. He stayed until the administration could find him a good fat $10,000 job to go to, taking with him a letter from the President praising him highly for his conduct as civil service commissioner. Why did he stay? Why did Burleson's zeal in ousting McIlhenny and selecting his successor lag? It was because Burleson needed McIlhenny in his business—and this brings up the matter of examinations for presidential post offices, especially those paying a salary of more than $2,400.

"Business training and experience" is the principal thing in these examinations. Who collects the facts upon which an applicant is rated on business training and experience? A post-office inspector. From whom does the inspector collect these facts? From persons living in the town where the post office is located. Who selects the persons to be interviewed by the inspector as to an applicant's business training and experience? The inspector does—with such hints as may be given by the department.

On these investigating trips the post-office inspector is accompanied by some one connected with the Civil Service Commission, who, it is perfectly safe to say, never finds it advisable to differ very much from the inspector—he simply goes along. The information collected by the inspector is forwarded to the commission, where it is rated.

It is obvious that this kind of an examination, considered as an examination by the Civil Service Commission, is susceptible to abuse. At least, there is abundant ground for a difference of opinion as to its advisability.

SPLIT ON EXAMINATION.

Burleson and McIlhenny favored this kind of an examination. Galloway and Craven voted against it, and this was an unwise step if their highest desire was simply to hold onto their jobs. The President, having given the Civil Service Commission over to Burleson as an appendage of the Post Office Department, any opposition to the wishes of Burleson was unpardonable.

The matter was finally left to the President, who pronounced in favor of the plan proposed by Burleson and McIlhenny—the plan which is now pursued in these examinations. Of course, after the President decided in favor of this kind of an examination, Galloway and Craven withdrew all opposition to it and tried to have the examinations for all presidential post offices conducted honestly and impartially and favored the nomination of the applicants who stood highest in the examinations, in accordance with the plain terms of the Executive order of March 31, 1917, providing for such examinations and nominations. In pursuing this course there were cases in which they were unable to carry out Burleson's wishes—hence Burleson's demand that the President request the immediate resignation of Galloway and Craven.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there are several things that I should like to take up that I am not going to take up now. I may go into them again, but I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is to speak on the league of nations and the treaty with Germany, and I do not want to interfere with him.

I want to call the attention of the Senate, however, to some written charges made against the Postmaster General by Mr. Galloway. Just before I read them, I want to say again that the particular things that I referred to in reference to the impeachment of the Postmaster General have not even been referred to in the reply made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Under date of March 17, 1919, Mr. Galloway, a Democratic member of the Civil Service Commission, filed the following charges at the White House, duly signed:

1. Through the efforts of the commission's district secretary at San Francisco it was found that Clarence Tynan, second-class postmaster at Salinas, Calif., had solicited political contributions from postmasters in Monterey County, Calif., in violation of sections 118 and 119 of the Criminal Code. On the evidence submitted the commission recommended to the Attorney General that steps be taken for the prosecution of Mr. Tynan for his violation of sections 118 and 119, and the Post Office Department was requested, on December 21, 1916, to remove him from the service. He was indicted, tried, convicted, and fined $175. The department was repeatedly requested by the commission to remove this postmaster, but Mr. Burleson refused to do so.

About June, 1917, Mr. Burleson requested me to come to his office, where he urged that the commission dismiss or remove Mr. Snyder, our district secretary at San Francisco, because of his activity in collecting the evidence against Postmaster Tynan. I considered that this was a dishonorable proposition and refused to entertain it, as Mr. Snyder had done nothing more than his plain duty.

Now, Mr. President, I will not read all of this, but I will ask to have it all printed. For the reasons given before, I want to hurry through. But I am going to read No. 5 of the charges, which is as follows:

5. Just before the last congressional election, Mr. McArdle, secretary of Mr. Burleson, addressed a letter to the postmasters in the State of Nevada, urging the postmasters to do everything in their power to reelect United States Senator HENDERSON. In some way a copy of this letter fell into the hands of Senator PENROSE, of Pennsylvania. Senator PENROSE had the letter read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The commission took cognizance of the case by addressing a letter to Mr. McArdle asking him for a statement in the matter. This letter remained unanswered for several weeks. Again Mr. McArdle was written to in an effort to obtain a statement from him. To neither of these letters has the commission yet had a reply. I have understood from some source that Mr. Burleson told Mr. McArdle to pay no attention to this commission's request in this case.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. Through the efforts of the commission's district secretary at San Francisco it was found that Clarence Tynan, second-class postmaster at Salinas, Calif., had solicited political contributions from postmasters in Monterey County, Calif., in violation of sections 118 and 119 of the Criminal Code. On the evidence submitted the commission recommended to the Attorney General that steps be taken for the prosecution of Mr. Tynan for his violation of sections 118 and 119, and the Post Office Department was requested, on December 21, 1916, to remove him from the service. He was indicted, tried, convicted, and fined $175. The department was repeatedly requested by the commission to remove this postmaster, but Mr. Burleson refused to do so.

About June, 1917, Mr. Burleson requested me to come to his office, where he urged that the commission dismiss or remove Mr. Snyder, our district secretary at San Francisco, because of his activity in collecting the evidence against Postmaster Tynan. I considered that this was a dishonorable proposition and refused to entertain it, as Mr. Snyder had done nothing more than his plain duty.

2. About 13 months ago the commission held an examination for presidential postmaster at Buffalo, Wyo. Four persons took the examination. One qualified. After the lapse of 13 months Mr. Burleson returned that case to Commissioner McIlhenny, who, without consultation with the commission, directed that the papers be rerated in the hope of disqualifying the highest eligible and thereby ordering a new examination. The case came to my desk after the papers had been rerated and the examiners had determined that the man who 13 months ago had been rated as eligible was then ineligible. Knowing of Commissioner McIlhenny's underhanded methods of not allowing such cases to come to the commission, as they should in the ordinary course of business, I disagreed with our examiners in the case and reaffirmed the original rating and declined to hold a new examination. Commissioner Craven joined me in this decision. To have declared this man ineligible after 13 months had elapsed would have made the Civil Service Commission a laughingstock and have absolutely destroyed confidence in its ratings. Many months after the examination was held the Post Office Department sent an inspector to Buffalo to investigate the eligibles. The only thing that the post-office inspector reported against the highest eligible was that he was "inclined to buy everything he saw, although he was not in debt," and also that "he had a poor memory."

3. Early in 1917 an examination was held for presidential postmaster at Lockhart, Tex. On November 14, 1917, the following certifications were made to the Post Office Department:

Name and grade.
Tyre H. Brown	86.85
Tom F. Harris	85.55
Albert S. Grigsby	82.20
Miss Emma K. Burleson	81.15
Mrs. Daisy Franks	71.00
Hugh W. Pritchard	66.85
Joe L. Lancaster	47.40

Shortly after this certification was made to Mr. Burleson his secretary, Mr. McArdle, called me on the telephone and said that the Postmaster General's niece, Miss Emma K. Burleson, was fourth on the list, and that the Postmaster General was very greatly interested in the case and desired me personally to see to it that the papers were rerated for the purpose of making his niece number one on the list. Then the case came to me with a letter from the First Assistant Postmaster General formally requesting that the papers be reviewed. I directed that the papers be reviewed, and wrote to the department that after a careful review and reconsideration of the papers it was found that no change could be made in the ratings. These letters, of course, are in the files of the commission.

4. In August, 1918, Mr. Burleson, through his secretary, telephoned to me that Mr. Eugene Reed, a former Member of Congress from New Hampshire, and then a candidate for the United States Senate from New Hampshire, was being sent down to see me with reference to the postmastership at Portsmouth, N. H. He said he was very anxious to have a man in whom Mr. Reed was interested appointed postmaster at Portsmouth, and urged me to make his man number one, if possible. In a little while Mr. Reed came in and stated his case, urging the importance of his candidate's appointment in assisting in his candidacy for the United States Senate. I had a very pleasant chat with Mr. Reed and told him that the only thing I could do for him was to inform Mr. Burleson of the name of the man who was rated the highest, as it was our understanding that no information concerning presidential postmaster examinations should be given out at the commission's office. I told him I would do what I could to expedite the examination of the applicants and would advise Mr. Burleson as early as possible of the name of the highest eligible.

5. Just before the last congressional election Mr. McArdle, secretary to Mr. Burleson, addressed a letter to the postmasters in the State of Nevada, urging the postmasters to do everything in their power to reelect United States Senator HENDERSON. In some way a copy of this letter fell into the hands of Senator PENROSE, of Pennsylvania. Senator PENROSE had the letter read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The commission took cognizance of the case by addressing a letter to Mr. McArdle, asking him for a statement in the matter. This letter remained unanswered for several weeks. Again Mr. McArdle was written to in an effort to obtain a statement from him. To neither of these letters has the commission yet had a reply. I have understood from some source that Mr. Burleson told Mr. McArdle to pay no attention to this commission's request in this case.

6. The commission recently held an examination for the third-class post office at Fries, Va., and the results were certified to the department. The department returned the papers to the commission, stating that it had been discovered that the highest eligible had at some time in his life lost one hand, and requesting the commission to declare the highest man ineligible because of this defect. Mr. Craven and myself voted against the cancellation of his eligibility, Mr. McIlhenny voting in favor of it.

A great many presidential postmaster cases have been sent to Commissioner McIlhenny for rerating in the hope of declaring the highest man ineligible. Of course, I am not in position to say what Mr. Burleson may have said to Mr. McIlhenny in these cases, because Mr. McIlhenny has persistently withheld from the commission everything that it was possible for him to withhold. Commissioner McIlhenny has performed innumerable acts in the name of the Civil Service Commission of which the commission had, in fact, no knowledge. One of the three men, Mr. Yaden, who examines the presidential postmaster papers, made the statement to me that Commissioner McIlhenny practically dictated the ratings in every examination for presidential postmaster. In view of the situation which has existed at this commission since I became a member on June 20, 1913, it has been impossible for Commissioner Craven and myself to learn just what was going on here because of the fact that Mr. McIlhenny had an air-tight organization within the commission which did his absolute bidding. This situation continued until June 26, 1917, when I informed Mr. McIlhenny that this matter of maladministration could not longer continue. On July 5 and on July 9 Commissioner Craven and I reported the situation to the President personally. Even after that date I went along pleasantly with Mr. McIlhenny in an effort to do team work, until in October, when I caught him in a falsehood, and, confronting him with it, he called me a liar, which I promptly resented.

I mention these cases specifically in order to show that Mr. Burleson had a motive for favoring my retirement from the Civil Service Commission.

Inclosed herewith please find a statement made by the secretary of the commission with reference to the one and only sharp controversy I had with Mr. McIlhenny.

Sincerely, yours,

CHAS. M. GALLOWAY.

Mr. NORRIS. In conclusion, Mr. President, I want to read two letters from a prominent Democrat of my State, which, in a way, may be said to be in defense of Mr. Burleson. I have no doubt that in the Democratic Party there are many pie-counter statesmen who objected to the order of President Wilson, who do not want it enforced, who did not want it made in the first place, who would be glad to see Mr. Burleson disregard it more than he has disregarded it, and who are angry with Mr. Burleson because he has not disregarded it more than he has. There is not any question about that.

I have no sympathy, of course, with those men. They are entitled to their opinion. I am not finding any fault with them. I do not believe that that is proper, however. I think that we ought to see, as far as we can, that this order is enforced in good faith. I am going to read two letters from a man well known in my State, a prominent Democrat, in which he condemns Mr. Burleson in order to satisfy some of his Democratic friends that the senior Senator from Nebraska is not able always to get Democrats in office. The first of these letters reads:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., May 31, 1919.

That is the letterhead.

MY DEAR MRS. WEEKES: I have your letter and hasten to reply.

Burleson says "result of examination is only thing that will count—no politics—makes no difference if a Republican is chosen."

That is the kind of a Postmaster General we have, and this is what makes Democrats boiling hot and has caused numbers of them to band together to insist upon Burleson's removal.

HITCHCOCK was the only Democrat in Congress to voice a protest against Burleson's tyranny, and, of course, Burleson didn't like it.

We will likely suffer the distinct embarrassment one of these days of seeing a Republican newspaper man who writes bitterly partisan copy being chosen to supplant a Democrat in one of our good Nebraska towns. We held the appointment up for a long time—

You notice, he says "we"—

by checkmating confirmation, but will be unable to do so with a Republican majority.

All of this is a burning shame, but Burleson, the tyrant, has the upper hand and proposes to keep it.

There is one ray of light, however, and it may penetrate the dark recesses to Democratic advantage before the Norfolk postmaster is chosen.

If Burleson is removed before the appointment comes it may be that his successor will see to it that justice is done. I will watch developments closely and will keep you advised.

Again I say, Burleson should be "strafed"; then Democracy would stand at least an even chance of survival. Otherwise I fear the sins of this tyrant will be visited upon our party for years to come.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

(Signed) EARL B. GADDIS,
Secretary to Senator Hitchcock.

Mr. President, who is Earl B. Gaddis? Earl B. Gaddis is the Washington correspondent of the leading Democratic newspaper in my State, owned, edited, published, and controlled by my colleague, Senator HITCHCOCK; and I might add that Mr. Gaddis draws a salary from the Treasury of the United States. He is not permitted to go into the Senate press gallery, because, under the rules of the Senate and the press gallery, he can not be admitted because of his official position. But by virtue of the favor of my colleague in his appointment of Mr. Gaddis as his secretary, he is admitted where other newspaper men can not be admitted—on the floor of the Senate. He sat over on the Democratic side part of the time yesterday while I was speaking, and he just left the Chamber a few minutes ago.

Mr. President, later on, on July 31, Mr. Gaddis wrote another letter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I did not hear what the Senator read from Mr. Gaddis first. What was the communication?

Mr. NORRIS. I read a letter. I am just going to read another one.

This is written on United States Senate stationery:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., July 31, 1919.

The other one was written on May 31.

MY DEAR MR. WEEKES—

I suppose he is the husband of the woman to whom he wrote the other letter—

Have your letter of the 19th, and hasten to reply to it—

He received the letter of the 19th, and he answered on July 31. He has been hastening pretty rapidly, you will observe.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator must remember that the mail service is interrupted nowadays, since it has been Burlesonized.

Mr. NORRIS. It is either that he is mistaken or else he will have to charge it up to Burleson. The letter reads:

Have your letter of the 19th and hasten to reply to it.

Reference to the Ainsworth matter, which you mention as having been cited to you in the Senator's letter of May 31—the Senator could not obtain the appointment of a man there friendly to the Democratic cause.

When a Republican was named he managed to hold up the appointment. That was all he could do. But now, under a Republican Senate, he will be forced to give up that and must see a shameless Republican named for the place. At no time, under this new system of Burleson's, did the Senator have the remotest chance of naming a Democratic friend.

Also with reference to the Scottsbluff matter, mentioned in Arthur Mullen's office—in Mrs. W's presence—we did not wire for the name of a man to name there. We merely suggested to Arthur that he get some Democrats in the examination there who might stand strong chances of passing the examination. We made it perfectly plain to Arthur that our only hope lay in getting some Democrat in the race there who could stand the examination.

Arthur Mullen is the Democratic national committeeman of the State of Nebraska—

I might add that the outlook now is that a Republican topped the list and must be named for the place. HITCHCOCK has no more chance of getting a Democrat in there than a snowball has in August weather in Nebraska.

So you see, with these facts in your possession, there is anything but politics being indulged in by the administration in naming of postmasters.

Senator HITCHCOCK has agreed with few things which this man Burleson has done since taking office—particularly since the war came on. And he has voiced that disagreement as many other Democrats have done. But not a Democrat here in Washington has the least thing to do with naming of postmasters. All they can do is get their friends to take examinations and pray that civil-service marks will lead later to their elevation to the places. That is all the good Lord could do if He were a Democrat now and here trying to get justice for His party in the naming of His postmasters.

If Gentle, at Norfolk, is not a loyal American—

That was the man who was a Republican, and who won out on the examination. Here is the suggestion as to how to get him out:

If Gentle, at Norfolk, is not a loyal American or is an immoral citizen his appointment can be held up. But those are the only grounds upon which there is the slightest show of keeping him out of the place.

I agree with what you say about the damned inconsistencies in running the Post Office Department this way. It is a shame that we must endure it, the Lord knows. But the game can not be beaten the way it's played just now. Thank Heaven, there may be a way opened up later whereby it can be beaten.

Now, listen to this:

But when that time comes it may be too close to the time the Republicans will take the administration away from us, simply because they play politics to the limit all the time.

Arthur Mullen understands the difficulties precisely. Talk the matter over with him some time, or if you are in Omaha on July 24, when the national chairman and his party are there, join them and hear what they've got to say on the subject.

With kind regards and best wishes,

(Signed) EARL B. GADDIS,
Secretary to Senator Hitchcock.

Mr. President, when the President and Mr. Burleson started out on this plan, which I believe was right, to take the post offices out of politics, they must have expected condemnation from politicians of that kind. They must expect to be condemned. And when they refuse to go as far as the pie-counter statesmen would like to have them go, then they are condemned, of course. But Mr. Burleson is unworthy of his office unless he has the courage and the nerve to stand up against such politicians and pie-counter statesmen.

Mr. President, there is more that I expected to bring out and to read at this time, but because of the hour, and because the Senator from Wisconsin desires to make some remarks on the peace treaty, I will close for the present.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to occupy only one or two minutes of the time of the Senate to make a few observations upon the speech of President Wilson at Salt Lake City night before last.

In the speech President Wilson referred in very emphatic terms to article 10 of the treaty as being the heart of the covenant. Since the President began his transcontinental journey the heart of this covenant has suffered several displacements. When the President spoke in Indianapolis on September 4 he said:

The heart of the covenant of the league is that the nations solemnly covenant not to go to war for nine months after a controversy becomes acute.

A little later the heart of the covenant was transferred to article 11, and now we find him stating that it is in article 10.

In the speech at Salt Lake City, after making some comment upon the effect of reservations, concerning which I do not wish to take the time to discuss now, he said:

And in order to bring this matter, to put this matter in such a shape as will lend itself to a concrete elucidation, let me read you what I understand is a proposed form of reservation:

NO OBLIGATION UNDER ARTICLE 10.

"The United States assumes no obligation under the provisions of article 10 to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between other nations, whether members of the league or not, or to employ military and naval forces of the United States under any article for any purpose unless in any particular case that Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of military and naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so declare."

He then goes on:

Now, my fellow citizens [applause]. Now, wait a minute. You want to applaud that. Wait until you understand the meaning of it, and if you have a knife in your hands with which you intend to cut out the heart of this covenant, applaud; but if you want the covenant to have a heart in it and want it to have a purpose in it, want it to be something subscribed to by a red-blooded nation, withhold your applause. Understand this thing before you form your sentiment with regard to it. This is a rejection of the covenant. This is an absolute refusal to carry any part of the same responsibility that the other members of the league carry.

Mr. President, I do not know where the President secured this proposed form of reservation. It certainly has not been proposed to the Senate thus far. But I rise for the purpose of saying that unless a reservation substantially such as that read by the President is incorporated as a part of the ratification resolution, this peace treaty is not, in my judgment, going to be ratified by the Senate.

I wish to go on and quote a little further from his speech. Referring to article 10 he said:

This is the heart of the covenant. And what are these gentlemen afraid of? Nothing can be done under that article of the treaty without the consent of the United States. I challenge them to draw any other deduction from the provisions of the covenant itself.

He says that "nothing can be done without the consent of the United States." In his Indianapolis speech he said, speaking of this covenant:

There is in that covenant not only not a surrender of the independent judgment of the Government of the United States, but an expression of it, because that independent judgment would have to join with the judgment of the rest.

The President of the United States must take one of the two horns of the dilemma that he is in. If the United States remains a free agent under the provisions of the article as it stands, the reservation that is proposed can not cut the heart out of the covenant. If it is a free agent, it can do no harm. If it is not a free agent, then the President—I do not say intentionally—has been misstating to the country the effect of article 10.

It is true, technically speaking, that before the United States can engage in war, under the provisions of the Constitution Congress must give its consent; but the President of the United States is asking us now, in ratifying this treaty with article 10 in it in its present form, to pledge the solemn word of the United States that whenever the occasion arises it will engage in war, if necessary, to preserve the territorial integrity of any member of the league from external aggression.

The President upon another occasion sought to convey the impression that the United States could only act upon the advice of the council, when the President must know that the undertaking in article 10 to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every member of the league against external aggression is a promise irrespective of any advice of the council. If we enter into the covenant in its present form and the territorial integrity of any nation is destroyed, the United States must, to the full extent of its last man and its last dollar, in keeping with its promise, restore that integrity or else be in the same position that Germany was in in violating the neutrality of Belgium, and the United States would be in the position of treating this treaty as a mere scrap of paper.

Mr. President, the people of this country are not in favor of the United States obligating itself to use the military and naval forces of the United States for any purpose. They are not in favor of our binding ourselves to preserve the territorial integrity of any other member of the league. And, Mr. President, when we come to the final consideration of this question, if I, as one Senator, must choose between voting for the ratification of the treaty as it is and obligating the people of this country to engage in war against their will and voting for the rejection of the treaty, I shall unhesitatingly vote for the rejection of the treaty.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 25, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, how shall the people of this country, the authorities in State and Nation, meet the present crisis which threatens to paralyze one of the greatest industries among us, causing sorrow and suffering to the laborer, discouragement to the capitalist, inconvenience and suffering to the people in general?

Give to those who have the problem before them wisdom, courage, strength to remove all injustices, adjust all wrongs, and bring peace and harmony.

In this Government of the people, under its benign Constitution, the ballot is in the hands of the humblest as well as the greatest. Through this instrumentality all disputes should be adjusted without resort to force, and right have its sway, to the good of all, under the leadership of the great Master Workman who lives and reigns. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE HOUSE FLAG.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on a patriotic subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, we were all gratified a week ago when the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] stated that the ladies of the Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution most magnanimously and graciously had presented to this House the beautiful banner now hanging behind the Speaker's forum. That flag, though young, is yet already old historically, for it witnessed the wonderful reception given to Gen. Pershing. It has heard also the notable speeches made on that day by Senator CUMMINS, by our beloved ex-Speaker [Mr. CLARK of Missouri], and by the present occupant of the chair. It has heard that brilliant address of eloquence and of culture delivered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT, in welcoming our distinguished visitor. [Applause.] Feeling, Mr. Speaker, that this flag in its honored position should have every incident connected therewith officially recorded, I have taken the liberty this morning of referring to something which I know will be of interest to all the Members and will make the history of the flag complete from the beginning. Two veterans of the Great War came here to the Capitol and with their own hands placed the flag in its position, the flag for the maintenance of whose honor they had fought on foreign soil. [Applause.] The names of those two men are Capt. Herbert G. Rosboro, of New York, and Sergt. Henry H. Farrell, of New Hampshire. [Applause.]

I want to refer to just one other thing, Mr. Speaker. When the old flag hung there, there was a continuous controversy as to the direction in which the union should be placed. There will be controversy in regard to the placing of the union of this flag. There is no positive law upon the subject of displaying the flag, but the War Department, realizing the importance of uniformity, have issued a circular making numerous suggestions in regard to the proper display of the national ensign. They give it as their opinion that when the flag is hung upon a wall in a vertical position "the union should be to the north or east." They have made this definition purely upon the points of the compass and not with reference to the surroundings of the flag. According to the War Department, if the flag should be hung upon the wall opposite, following out their suggestion that "the union should be to the north or east," it would bring the union to the right of the observer. The idea of the department is to have uniformity of direction of all flags, rather than the display of individual ones. This would be applicable in streets, for instance, by which the unions of all the flags displayed on either side of the line of buildings would point in the same direction, irrespective of the position of the observer.

Nearly every patriotic society differs with the War Department. They maintain that the flag should be hung in reference to its immediate surroundings, and that when placed on a wall the union should always be to the right as the observer sees it, and never to the left. I do not court a controversy, however, but do desire to state further that the department sanctions a flat surface, free from folds or drapery, whenever the flag is hung vertically. But in this regard there is one consideration that transcends the matter of drapery, and it is that the flag should never be so placed that it can be soiled or even touched by any one passing near it.

Owing to the close proximity of the flag to the Speaker's chair, the narrowness of the passage behind the rostrum, and to the fact that books, subject to constant use, are shelved back of the flag, it is necessary in order to preserve and protect it that the banner be draped back as we see it. I make this statement in order to relieve us of any criticism of violation of etiquette. It is done because we are not willing that there should be any desecration of our national ensign, however innocent and unintentional that desecration may be. [Applause.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2972. An act to extend the cancellation stamp privilege for the Roosevelt Memorial Association.

LEAVE TO PRINT REMARKS.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short article on my friend and colleague, Mr. SCHALL, of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article upon his colleague of Minnesota, Mr. SCHALL. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, by whom is this article written?

Mr. KNUTSON. It is from the National Magazine.

Mr. WALSH. I think we ought to give the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a rest for a while, and I am going to resume the prerogative of objecting to extensions by magazine articles.

Mr. KNUTSON. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. EMERSON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram which contains resolutions adopted at a meeting of Hungarian Jews at Cleveland, expressing their disapproval of the discrimination that is made against them in Hungary. I have been requested to present this telegram.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram relative to discriminations against the Jews in Hungary. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, what has the House got to do about any discrimination in Hungary? The gentleman was asked to have this printed in the RECORD?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

LIVE-STOCK SHIPMENT CONTRACTS.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday when we had up for discussion an amendment which I offered to the railway rate bill, I made the statement that the United States Supreme Court had held that a provision in the live-stock shipment contract which required notice in writing to be given within a limited period of time as a condition precedent to the filing of suit had been held valid. Several Members questioned whether or not a stipulation of that kind would be held valid or had been held valid by the United States Supreme Court.

As several gentlemen asked for a citation, I have obtained this time in order to call attention to a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, cited in the advance sheets of that court; dated July 15, 1919, in the case of Erie Railroad Co. v. John R. Shuart (39 Sup. Ct. Rep., 630). I want now to read the provision that was in the live-stock shipment contract:

> That no claim for damages which may accrue to the said shipper under this contract shall be allowed or paid by the said carrier, or sued for in any court by said shipper, unless a claim for such loss or damage shall be made in writing, verified by the affidavit of the said shipper or his agent, and delivered to the general auditor of the said carrier at his office in the city of Chicago, Ill., within five days from the time said stock is removed from said car or cars; and that if any loss or damage occurs upon the line of a connecting carrier then such carrier shall not be liable unless a claim shall be made in like manner, and delivered in like time, to some proper officer or agent of the carrier on whose line the loss or injury occurs.

Here is what the court says with reference to that statement:

> Under our former opinions the clause requiring presentation of a written claim is clearly valid and controlling as to any liability arising from beginning to end of the transportation contracted for.

The United States Supreme Court holds that kind of a stipulation valid. When the live-stock shipper tenders his cattle to the railway company he is presented with a long written contract with a lot of provisions in it. If he were to stop to read it he would probably be told that he must stand aside for other business. Practically, therefore, he is not given a chance to read the contract which contains those conditions and stipulations, and many a man in such cases has found himself unable to recover damages for stock injured. In the case cited the injuries were caused by the backing up of an engine into a train of cars while the cattle were being unloaded through a shute—a clear case of negligence—and yet, because of the fact that the shipper did not present a verified claim within five days, he was not permitted to recover. That is the correction that I sought to have made.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. When was that decision handed down?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That decision was handed down June 9, 1919, but it follows along the line of other decisions. A shipper must present the claim or be defeated, and it is causing a great deal of trouble and complaint from the sections where these shipments originate.

Mr. CONNALLY. What was the length of time of notice in this decision?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Five days from the time that the stock arrived at the point of destination. However, in the case of S. L. I. & S. Co. v. Starbird (37 Sup. Ct. Rept., 462) a 36-hour stipulation was held valid.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Illustrating a case, say cattle are shipped from Amarillo, Tex., the gentleman's home, to Chicago, and almost invariably a shipper accompanies those cattle on behalf of the owner.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Usually the shipper or some employee.

Mr. BLANTON. Some employee is in charge.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; as a rule, though not always.

Mr. BLANTON. That employee knows every single item of delay, every single instance of rough handling, every single failure to properly feed and water en route, and every incident that would enter into an element of damage, because that is what the owner sends him with the cattle for, and when he gets to Chicago and those cattle are injured, and sell on the market for less money than they should bring, he almost immediately wires the owner the price at which the cattle were sold and the incidents of injury and damage connected with the shipment. The owner is therefore in a position to make his claim for damage within five days after the cattle are unloaded, and possibly this is the reason that our Supreme Court has held that a contract is good which specially provides that five days is enough time in which the shipper should make initial complaint, and I take it that the Supreme Court considered all those matters when passing upon the case cited by the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In reply to what the gentleman says, I take it that he would be in favor of abolishing the two-year statute of limitations and establish the five days instead.

Mr. BLANTON. No. I am in favor of reasonable stipulations both as to the shipper and the carrier, but of course my sympathies are naturally with the shipper.

Mr. JONES of Texas. And it is unreasonable to expect a man to read and to know those stipulations. If it were written into the law so that every man might know what the particular stipulation is, a man could protect himself, but the companies change and shift these written contracts until a man never knows what is going to be in them next, and they come up with a new provision or a new stipulation in another contract that is presented and the man has no chance to know what his rights are. There should be a provision for a uniform bill of lading. If it were written into the law of the land, just like the statute of limitations, that a man must present a claim for damages within a certain specified period from the time the cattle arrive at the point of destination, then an opportunity would be given each and every shipper, as well as the transportation company, to know that the shipper's rights depend on his complying therewith, and the whole community would become informed, and rights would be protected.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the law of Texas provides no limitation in shipping contracts shall be legal which limits the time for filing claims to less than 90 days?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It certainly does.

Mr. PARRISH. I would like to ask a further question, if it is not a fact that in a great many shipments, such as are cited by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], the shipments are accompanied often by men who can not assume any responsibility, some of them by negro hired men who take care of a trainload of cattle?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Most assuredly. Some of the cattle shipments are a part of a long train. A man may go back and ask for information and can not get it. Sometimes the stock is unloaded and part loaded on a different section of the train.

Mr. PARRISH. Is it not a fact that in Texas there have been a great many shippers who have been denied the right to recover because the courts have held such provisions valid, who have been deprived of substantial justice in the courts of Texas?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is true, and our State legislature has made provision which protects shippers, but these stipulations were carried in the shipping contracts after the Federal control commenced and were held valid.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. It is my impression that the limitation only held as to Federal courts, because it certainly would not affect our State laws and State courts.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Practically all the shipments are interstate——

Mr. BLACK. But you can sue the initial carrier and do not have to go to the Federal court.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In this opinion the Carmack amendment is discussed, and it is held that the provision will apply even were the initial carrier or the terminal carrier sued. If you brought action in the State court, the same conditions would apply to the shipment, it being an interstate shipment, and the State court would be compelled to follow the decision of the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no; not necessarily, though it probably would do so.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not a fact you could not go to the Federal courts unless the amount was in excess of $3,000 or unless some Federal question were involved?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is very true. However, when the State court has rendered final decision, if it fails to follow the United States decisions the company can appeal to the United States Supreme Court. The obligation of contracts, the due process of law, and other provisions of the Constitution are held to be involved. They have gone from a justice court in one of these State cases to the Supreme Court of the United States. That decision was made on a provision stipulating that the attorney's fees might be secured against the railroad company.

Mr. BLACK. A Federal question was raised in that case raising the question that the judgment was without due process of law.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman surely does not take the position that if the United States Supreme Court holds an interstate shipment contract is valid a man can not go into the Supreme Court of the United States if the State court fails to follow the decision. That would raise several Federal questions according to the decisions.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, yes; I hold that the State court does not have to follow the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and frequently does not follow it, though, of course, the complaining party may have his appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States when Federal questions are involved.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the gentleman will consult the case that I have cited he will find that it was taken up after final action by the State court. I desire to call attention to one more decision just briefly. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] said he did not believe that the stipulation shortening the period of limitation would be valid. I simply want to call to your attention briefly the case of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company against Leatherwood, in the same pamphlet, July 15, 1919, a decision rendered June 9 in the United States Supreme Court. I will not take the time to read the facts of the case, but quote an excerpt from the decision:

The provision in the original bill of lading limiting to six months the time within which suits may be brought not being unreasonable, was valid; and as the original bill of lading remained binding, the lower courts erred in denying it effect. The judgment of the court of civil appeals must therefore be reversed.

This decision of the Supreme Court of the United States held the period of limitation may be changed by contract. Now, I submit, with these conditions prevailing, the law ought to be clarified so that both the shipper and the transportation companies may know their rights, so there may not be any opportunity to defraud the various shippers by concealing from them the provisions of the contract of shipment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and obviously there is no quorum.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-six Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio to make a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time allotted for debate be extended 30 minutes in order that I may address the House on the bill, and particularly on the question of the necessity for the so-called license plan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended 30 minutes, to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman modify that request to allow a little additional time?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It may be advisable to have some one respond to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My proposition is not so much in response. The gentleman will recall that all the time for debate day before yesterday was taken by gentlemen in opposition. My plan simply is to reply to them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman from Ohio had spoken an hour.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for an additional 15 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request by asking for 45 minutes, 30 minutes to be occupied by myself, or a portion of the 30 minutes, and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio modifies his request by asking unanimous consent for 45 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would suggest that the gentleman make it an hour and let me have 15 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from North Carolina has an hour and 24 minutes. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] occupied 2 hours in discussing the matter, and I took the opposite side of the question for 40 minutes, and I think it only fair that 15 minutes be allowed to answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] on the licensing feature of this bill, and that time be yielded to our side to be occupied by whoever wants to answer the gentleman, if they wish to make an answer. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina does not ask any more time for himself. He has an hour and 24 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving further the right to object, the "gentleman from North Carolina" had three hours and a half and the gentleman from Michigan had three hours and a half, and "the gentleman from North Carolina" yielded more than half of his time to gentlemen on the other side; and then the gentleman, in addition to his three hours and a half and an hour and three-quarters, which the "gentleman from North Carolina" yielded to him, asked unanimous consent to extend that time an hour, which "the gentleman from North Carolina" consented to; and now they ask for 45 minutes on that side, and "the gentleman from North Carolina" only modestly asks that he be given 15 minutes in which to reply to some of the gentlemen. They may not need a reply, but I think I ought to have the 15 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not object to that.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that the time for general debate be extended 1 hour, 30 minutes to be occupied by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], 15 minutes by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and 15 minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8078.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to now proceed.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized.

[Mr. KITCHIN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Gentlemen, I shall take five minutes under the five-minute rule to tell you more about this. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is recognized.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], in his most instructive and entertaining speech, devoted some time at the beginning to commenting upon the division which exists in the Republican Party on this measure. He says that never before has he seen such a division existing on any tariff bill. And from that he draws the conclusion that the Republican Party can never be held together except by what he describes as "the cohesive power of public plunder." I can not help thinking, coming as it does from the gentleman from North Carolina, that it amounts to a confession that plunder is what keeps the Democratic Party together to-day, because I happen to know that the gentleman from North Carolina does not agree with the President of the United States on anything. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Shoulder to shoulder during the last Congress we stood together preventing measures going through this Congress which the President advocated, to give more and more autocratic authority to his present administration.

Now, the only "plunder" that we are trying to get rid of by this bill is the plunder of this country by the German trust. That is what this bill aims at. The gentleman from North Carolina laments the fact that for many years when we were in power we did nothing to protect the dye industry. If that is true, when the Democratic Party came into power and passed the Underwood law, why did not they do something to protect the dye industry?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit, we increased it on the whole 10 per cent over the Payne-Aldrich Act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, 10 per cent! I am not sure of that, either. But if that is so, it amounted to nothing. Now, as a matter of fact, the first time that the Democratic Party ever took any action in relation to this industry was when it adopted a bill introduced by a Republican Member of Congress, the late Mr. Hill, of Connecticut. It is true that the duties were reduced, but the bill was identical, word for word, with the present law, except that the duties were cut practically in half, and those that remained were on a sort of fade-away plan, to cease and terminate 10 years after the passage of the act. I do not think that even the gentleman from North Carolina would advocate such a proposition to-day.

Now, I want to take up the time at my command in discussing only one aspect of this situation, and that is the necessity for the so-called license system. I make the assertion that no matter how high we were to place the tariffs in this law we could not by any possibility prevent the dumping of the existing stock of German dyes on this market at any price, regardless of cost, with the sole object of destroying the chemical industry that now exists in this country.

I take it that there are two things which stand out particularly in this situation: First, the need of protection against Germany; and, second, the need of giving some suitable answer to the action of England, France, and Japan. Is there a gentleman on this side of the House who would support the principle of opening the great American market to nations which absolutely close their markets to us? It seems to me that that would be the doctrine of internationalism run wild. And yet that is what we will do, gentlemen, if we do not have some form of prohibition of importation, except under certain conditions, in this bill. I am not particular what it shall be, but to make fitting answer we must adopt some form of a so-called license system which will prevent the importation of dyes into this country which are now made here.

Let me quote a few sentences from the evidence before the committee with regard to the first proposition, namely, the ability of Germany to-day to compete in dyes in this market. I quote first from the testimony of Maj. Sill, of the United States Army, contained in a report giving his experiences very recently in Germany in the occupied district. First he says:

Owing to the great foresight and efficiency of the German prewar system—that is, efficiency from a military standpoint in particular—all of their man power was registered and so classified that when the call to battle came they kept a large proportion of their trained workmen within these plants. Consequently, they still have the majority of them ready to take part in a new battle for commercial supremacy.

And a little later he says:

The important point is that the American people, in particular, should realize that this important portion of Germany's industries is not crippled but intact and ready to operate, and is consequently a dangerous factor in the struggle for commercial supremacy, and also as a potential source of war material production unless properly controlled. Moreover, I do not think the German people as a whole realize completely the magnitude of their defeat; they count upon the Americans in particular very soon forgetting the horrors of the war, resuming their trade with them, utilizing their products, and allowing their industry to thrive once more. At present the only things they lack are raw materials and coal for the operation of the plants, which fortunately the Allies can control, unless the peace terms are lenient enough to allow them to operate on full scale as before. Let us hope that the American people and consumers of chemicals and dyestuffs will back up the American manufacturer so that this previous condition can not be restored.

Speaking of some of the plants he visited, he says:

It was our good fortune to pass through the devastated sections of France and some in Belgium on our way to Germany. One can not see this terrible destruction of land, factories, and cities, so complete and terrible that neither word nor picture can describe adequately, without being impressed by the contrast you see upon entering Germany, where all is serene, quiet, clean, and orderly, and scarcely any sign of destruction such as has been visited on the French.

Arriving in Cologne, we made our headquarters there while making a tour of investigation through the plant of the Farbenfabriken vorm. Friedrich Bayer & Co., at Leverkusen, and also the plant of Weiler-ter-Meer, at Uerdingen on the Rhine.

The plant of the Bayer Co. stands out prominently as the best and most modern of German chemical plants. It is a veritable city in itself, well laid out, with excellently constructed streets and brick buildings. Their office buildings and recreation buildings for the employees are luxurious palaces. This plant has expanded considerably during the war, and, despite the contrary assertions of its directors, was widely engaged in the manufacture of war products, particularly poison gases. We had the opportunity of meeting Dr. Duisberg, the chief director, and, incidentally, one of the ex-Kaiser's right-hand men in the development of the war. Many will remember him from his visit to this country at the time of the Chemical Congress in 1912. Incidentally, he hopes to be over here again very soon to see his "old-time friends."

Of the Badische Co. he says a little later:

A little later we went up to the greatest of all plants, the Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik, at Ludwigshafen. This plant employs about 16,000 men and covers many acres of ground. They have the plant for dyestuffs, intermediates, etc., at Ludwigshafen, and a little farther up the river, at Oppau, is located the plant for the Haber process.

That is the nitrate process. Now, mark this:

Considerable work on war products was done at Ludwigshafen, but they also were able to make dyestuffs on an appreciable scale during the war. At the present time they have a large stock on hand, ready to turn loose on the markets when permission is granted. They, too, had done considerable work on poison gases and explosive intermediates, but not to an extent which would at all interfere with their resumption of dyestuff manufacture on a large scale.

That is very illuminating, gentlemen, about the situation to-day in Germany.

Maj. Pope also visited that district, and he says, among other things:

If asked, any chemist or chemical engineer in the United States would say that he knew how much importance industrial Germany attaches to her chemical industry, but as a matter of fact it is impossible for anyone who has not been in Germany to realize her iron determination to regain the place she had before the war or to realize the sacrifices that have been made toward accomplishing this.

I wish I had time to quote more testimony on this point. The proposition that I desire to bring out is this, that with relation to the coal-tar chemical industry Germany is in as strong and even a stronger position to-day than she was before the war, when she dominated the world's market and supplied 85 to 90 per cent of our consumption. During the war special consideration was given by the high command to the operatives of these chemical factories. They were not drafted into the army. Labor was kept in the plants, and they were considerably expanded. They made all the poison gases for Germany during the war. They made most of the high explosives; but owing to that peculiar characteristic of the dye industry, at the same time that they were making gases and explosives they were also able to make dyes at the same time. They had on hand at the beginning of the war a stock presumably sufficient to supply the world's markets, and in the last four years they have been making dyes in every one of their factories. They have to-day, I know, an amount sufficient to overwhelm absolutely the American market. They have this stock not only in Germany but in Switzerland, and no doubt in other neutral countries, so that they will not have to wait until the peace treaty is ratified in order to begin to make shipments from Germany; but they may begin to-morrow, and that is what makes the necessity for action urgent and immediate. No conceivable tariff, even though it were five times as high as the tariff in this bill, would prevent that dumping. All it would do would be to put on dyes which must be imported a duty which would be to the great detriment of the American people.

Now, there is a great deal of misinformation, I think, on both sides of the House, as to what this so-called licensing system is. Let me begin at the beginning, gentlemen. If it were left to me to say that in order to protect the baby chemical industry of this country it was necessary to prohibit the importation of dyes altogether, for the next two years, I would stand for it. [Applause.] But it is not necessary to go as far as that. But how many of you, knowing what you do of the absolute necessity of preserving this industry here, not only for the industrial side of it, but for war preparedness side of it, how many of you would refuse to vote if necessary for a law which would prevent, for the next two years, the importation of any dye when the same dye was produced in this country? If that were necessary I think every man here would support it. But it is not necessary, because under the so-called licensing system, or, as I prefer to call it, the regulation-of-imports system—because this has nothing to do with a license to do business in this country—we can at the same time prevent the destruction of the American chemical industry and permit our textile manufacturers to get all the dyes they want which are not to-day produced in this country.

Some men of my party have asked me whether such a system as this is consistent with Republican principles? Why, gentlemen, it is absolutely consistent with the bed-rock doctrine of the Republican Party, that industries vital to the needs of this country ought to be protected and be permitted to grow. Now, if we could do it by the use of the tariff in this case, I would say, let us not embark on any new proposition, because this is new. But the situation is such that the tariff of itself will not do what Republicans want to do, save this industry in this country and permit it to grow.

Let me show you why this so-called licensing system is perfectly consistent with Republican principles. What you would accomplish by it first is that no dye or any other coal-tar chemical substance can come into this country if the same is produced here and can be procured at a fairly reasonable price. Here is the whole situation: An application comes for a license to import a certain dye or explosive or medicine or what you please. That immediately serves constructive notice on all American producers that there exists in this country a demand for that particular material. It offers them an incentive to expand, to let their chemists get to work, and within two years I venture to say that they will be producing it in this country. All this, too, is incidentally to the benefit of the consumer, because our experience so far has been that where we have had some competition in the last few years in the American dye market invariably the price has been very substantially reduced.

Or take, for instance, important medicinal preparations. Since we got hold of the salvarsan patent and licensed it to American producers—and mind you it is perhaps the most necessary medicinal preparation in the world—we have reduced the price to the American consumer from the former German price of $3.50 a dose to 40 cents a dose to-day. Within three years American competition has reduced that price 90 per cent, and that is what we may reasonably expect in other cases, if we permit this industry to live, in the next two years.

Now, no one believes that Germany cares anything about making an immediate profit on this vast accumulated store of dyes. What she wants to do is to put all American competition out of business in this market, and then, when there is no competition, exact such profit as she pleases. That is exactly what she did before the war, when we were at her mercy. Does anybody want to be at her mercy again? Why, the situation is different to-day from what it was at the time of the enactment of the Payne law. Then every textile manufacturer was opposed to any help for the American dye industry. They feared the increased cost to them, and they had good working agreements with the German trust, many of them; but to-day four-fifths of the big textile manufacturers in this country are for this proposition, because they remember what happened to them the day Germany went into war, when necessary dyes and dyestuffs went up thousands and thousands per cent, and frequently could not be obtained at any price. That is what would happen again under similar conditions if Germany could have free access to our markets.

Now, what is the situation with regard to the German trust, which, mind you, is more powerful than it was before the war? Because where there were six great companies then, to-day those companies are merged into one vast trust. They are cut off entirely from the Japanese, the French, and the British markets, and what is left for them. With all of these enormous factories running to-day full blast, with 60,000 workmen working night and day, where are they going to dispose of their goods? They can not do it in the markets of Great Britain, France, and Japan. Outside of the Chinese market there is only one, and that is the American market. Do you suppose that any question of price is going to deter them from aiming a blow at the vitals of the chemical industry of this country? Do you suppose that a duty of 500 per cent would deter them? They are farsighted men, and also the most unscrupulous lot that ever gathered together in any country. With their yellow-dog fund, with their unlimited capital, to accomplish their purpose, namely, to put us on our back, where we were before the war, they will sell their products at any price. Do you believe they will hesitate at what they can get for their product, which is practically velvet on their hands as the result of making gases and explosives? They would give it away if it would only prevent the development of our home industry.

To-day we are supplying about four-fifths of the American demand. We can supply everything except certain specialties and the class of dyes called vat dyes.

Now, there ought to be a licensing system—I do not care whether it is this one or some other one—insuring for the next two years that the only things that can come in shall be the specialties not now produced here, and thereby give encouragement to our manufacturers and skilled chemists to experiment along these various lines made evident by the license applications, and in two years we will have an industry which will be adequate, in all probability, to supply the whole American market.

And then the day will never come when we shall again be compelled to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to build explosive plants, hundreds of millions of dollars to erect plants to supply the dyes which the American people must have and which the Government must have for ink. During 1916 the Government functions were almost tied up for the lack of dyes, because, forsooth, there was no industry in this country. Gentlemen, if you do not do something to prevent the dumping of these German dyes on the American market, and the consequent ruin of our industry, we will again be absolutely dependent on the German industry for our dyes, as we were before the war.

Let me call attention to another reason why to-day the tariff alone will not solve the situation. Mind you, the German mark in the world's exchange is only worth 4 or 5 cents. It is worth 25 cents in Germany, but here it is only worth 4 or 5 cents. But the ad valorem of goods shipped in here is based on the value of the German mark, so that your ad valorem duties, instead of being somewhere about 60 per cent, will be enormously reduced. Duties based upon the value of the German mark as it is in the world's exchange to-day would not keep out anything. The only way to keep them out is by a license system, and simply because it is new shall we Republicans fail to pass it?

I would not support a licensing proposition except in a time of dire emergency, and even then I would not support it as a permanent policy. This is only for two years. If it were true, as I do not think it is, that some textile manufactureers might have a little difficulty here and there in procuring a special or high-priced dye, is it not worth it to them, as it surely is to the American people, to submit for two years to such a temporary inconvenience? That is the situation, gentlemen, as I see it.

I have studied this question as an amateur ever since 1908, when the Payne law was passed. As the gentleman from North Carolina suggests, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and I are the only Members of the House now who were on the Ways and Means Committee at that time. From then on I have been interested in this, because I have known for years of the intimate connection between the dyes and explosives, and the consequent purely national side of this question.

I remember that a friend of mine, a great chemist, told me not long ago something very significant of the way the Germans viewed the development of the coal-tar industry. About 30 years ago he graduated at Heidelberg, and on the day he went to bid good-by to the head professor of chemistry he said to him: "There is one thing that has somewhat puzzled me. I observe that practically the entire chemical force of Germany is being diverted into coal-tar chemical experimentation, that all the young men that graduate at universities in chemistry are starting in on that line. Why is it?" The professor put his hand on my friend's shoulder and said, "Young man, some day this will save the fatherland." It came unpleasantly close to saving the fatherland, because from the day the war started until the day the armistice was signed there was no question but that Germany was competent to fight forever in so far as her explosives and gases were concerned. It was the destruction of her morale and her man power and not lack of explosives that cost Germany the victory. [Applause.]

There is a pattern for us. Germany for 40 years devoted every energy and vast sums of money to the development of this industry, because while they could make enormous profits from it in timeo f peace they knew that upon the day the war came it would furnish them the bedrock of war material.

To-day their plants are in as good condition if not better than they were on August 1, 1914. They are deprived of three of the greatest markets of the world, and but one great market is left. Do you doubt that they will fail to take advantage of every method, fair or unfair, to destroy our baby chemical industry? You can not stop them with a tariff; you have got to do that by a license ssytem, and for that reason I advocate that system. If we are to save our industry, we must adopt it. There is no other way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. I think we ought to have more Members here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish I had time to answer in detail the speech made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], but in 15 minutes that is impossible. Suffice it to say, the gentleman from North Carolina did favor a high-tariff bill when he and the majority of the committee over which he presided supported the bill introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. Hill, a Republican.

It was an evidence of returning wisdom in the Democratic Party. For a long time the gentleman from North Carolina had insisted that a tariff was unconstitutional, and he had helped, with the present President of the United States, to write that into the Democratic platform in the convention of 1912, which met at Baltimore. The gentleman from North Carolina had begun to see the light when the Hill bill came along, and he was persuaded, particularly after Dr. Herty, of North Carolina, whose name was mentioned several times in the course of his address, also saw the light. Dr. Herty was the president of the American Chemical Society, a distinguished citizen of North Carolina, and a Democrat of long standing. Dr. Herty had come to see the light not as a Democrat but as a protectionist; he came before the Committee on Ways and Means and insisted that there should be a tariff on dyestuffs. And the bill was passed with the assistance of the Democrats who had thus reformed and come in under the Republican banner, notwithstanding their own professions made to the public in 1912, that a protective tariff was unconstitutional.

I am a little surprised that the gentleman from North Carolina should speak against the "plunderland" in the Republican Party, but if I had more time I should be very glad to follow him upon that subject and charge it up to the present administration. It was a reminder of the good old times when we did have square knockdown battles in the House of Representatives, when the Democrats stood on one side with their sophistries and heresies, and the Republicans stood on the other with their economic theories and practices. I wish we could go into that more fully now, but time is fleeting. The gentleman from North Carolina, however, has made apologies for coming into the Republican ranks and accepting the Republican doctrines. That is sufficient. I am glad to extend to him the hand of welcome.

I must thank him for his kind personal references, and wish I might take time to enlarge upon that subject. He is a fine fellow, and I appreciate very highly his good opinion. As to the alleged contest between the Republicans with respect to this dyestuffs bill, the gentleman from North Carolina stands upon a false premise. The contest is a legitimate one. The gentleman from North Carolina, as the Democratic Party pretended to do in the days of old, stands against special privilege. That was the hue and cry of the Democratic Party when "the great commoner" was in control. There was to be no special privilege under a Democratic administration. The gentleman from North Carolina believed in that, and yet the gentleman, after weeks of hearings upon this dyestuffs bill, stands to-day in favor of the absolute monopoly of the dyestuffs industry in the United States through a licensing commission which his administration will control. The gentleman from North Carolina goes further. He stands for the control of the dyestuffs industry in the United States affecting $3,000,000,000 worth of business in the hands practically of two great corporations in the United States, which have recently been consolidated and which will be in complete control of the output of all dyestuffs in the United States as soon as this bill passes, one of them being the great Du Pont Corporation and the other the great National Aniline & Chemical Co. These are the two concerns for which the gentleman from North Carolina now stands. These are the two concerns for which he apologizes in his desire to relieve the Alien Property Custodian and the present Attorney General of his responsibility for helping to bring about this legislation through the Chemical Foundation (Inc.). The gentleman from Ohio continues to refer to the German horde that is coming to invade the United States if this bill does not pass. Yet the gentleman from Ohio, like the gentleman from North Carolina, well knows that every one of the President's war powers still exists, and that he can keep out of this country now every pound of dyestuffs that he does not wish to have come here, and he knows that in certain recent proclamations of the War Trade Board, while we have resumed trade relations with Germany in certain respects, we have declined to permit of trade in dyestuffs and chemicals. These two gentlemen, who happen to be upon the same side of this controversy, know full well that the existing dyestuffs-tariff law, backed up by the war barrier, was sufficient to keep dyestuffs out of the United States, and that there were no German dyes of any consequence coming in after the passage of the Hill bill.

The gentleman from North Carolina is perfectly safe in his proposition that that bill was effective, since it was backed up by the war. No German ships were coming into the United States during that period, and they could bring no German dyestuffs. They know full well also, with regard to this invasion of $20,000,000 worth of dyestuffs now held up somewhere in Germany or England, that not a pound of it can come into the United States without the consent of the War Trade Board, now allied with the State Department through Executive order. They know full well that there is a supreme executive council of the Allies as a result of the peace conference in Paris, which will not permit a single pound of dyestuff to come into the United States in any shape unless that body gives its consent.

And yet, in order to force the American manufacturer, user, and consumer of dyes to buy dyes at the highest possible price from the combination which is thus formed in the United States under the auspices of the Alien Property Custodian, whom the gentleman from North Carolina defends, they would pass this bill and fasten upon the people of the United States, the users of hosiery, the users of underwear, the users of clothing, the users of hats, boots, and shoes—they would fasten upon them indefinitely an autocratic system born in England, which the business men of that country are now resisting, as I shall show in a moment. Gentlemen pause sometimes when we hear these startling statements about what the Germans are going to do to us. That may not be so much the question as the worry of the Germans about what we did to them. [Applause.] This administration under Mr. Wilson is now arranging to put the country on trade relations with Germany, but some subtle influence, some powerful influence, seems to be able to say to the administration, "Keep out dyestuffs in order that the big aniline interests here shall have a monopoly." The gentleman from Ohio suggests in his bill, and I have heard others say it, that we should forget trade and revenues and build a wall around the United States—keep all foreign products out. I believe in a protective tariff, but I want competition. If somebody in the United States can make dyestuffs besides those two great combinations, I will be better satisfied. [Applause.] I want competition here, but I do not want the kind of competition that is privately agreed upon by a little group that meets in the Alien Property Custodian's office and dispenses German property and patents. I am now going to tell the gentleman from North Carolina something that he does not know and that I did not know until this morning.

I want to tell him that in my judgment, upon information received, the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), of which Francis P. Garvan is president, the same Francis P. Garvan being Alien Property Custodian who seized those 4,500 German patents, which were privately sold to his corporation, the same Francis P. Garvan who is to be a special attorney general to detect bomb throwers under Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, the preceding Alien Property Custodian—I want to say my information is that this philanthropic, charitable, high-minded corporation, organized under the laws of Delaware with a capital of $500,000, made up largely of New York bankers serving the Alien Property Custodian at a dollar a year, and serving upon boards to administer German property that was seized, some of them taking fees as managers of these institutions, Cleveland H. Dodge, the largest contributor to the Wilson campaign fund and a leader amongst them—I want to say to my friend my information is that this philanthropic institution, headed by these high-minded men, appears to have been formed in the office of the Du Ponts in the city of Wilmington, Del. Walter F. Sykes, my informant——

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman's facts are correct, I think he will make some converts, perhaps.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman would not stand for an unfair combination. But I wish to say Mr. Walter F. Sykes, who we will admit is an interested party, his business being that of an importer of Swiss dyes which are to be kept out by this bill, took the trouble to investigate the manner in which this corporation was formed, and in a letter which he personally verified in my office yesterday stated that the original incorporators were as follows:

M. M. Clancy, P. D. Drew, and H. E. Knox.

The Clancy—

According to Mr. Sykes—

is May M. Clancy, residing at 300 North Harrison Street, and her occupation is stated to be that of employee of the Corporation Trust Co. of America, with offices on the fourth floor of the Du Pont Building in Wilmington. She is reputed to be a stenographer and is known to the office force as incorporation clerk, and has lately been transferred to the auditing and accounting company. She is considered to be a confidential clerk and has been connected with the concern for a long time.

The Drew is Pauline D. Drew, who resides at 1223 Washington Street, Wilmington, and is a stenographer in the offices of the same concern and under May Clancy.

The Knox is Hattie E. Knox, residing at 806 East Seventeenth Street, and she is also a stenographer in the offices of the same concern.

The Corporation Trust Co. of America is located on the fourth floor of the Du Pont Building immediately next to and surrounded by the offices of the Du Pont Co. itself; as a fact, one can not tell where the offices of the one concern start and where the other leaves off. There is immediate inside connection between the rooms of the two concerns.

These, apparently, are the original incorporators of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), the names of whose managers the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina read a few moments ago, including the great bankers of New York, some of whom have been holding the deposits for the Alien Property Custodian while they were serving down here as dollar-a-year men, managing the business of these corporations which the Alien Property Custodian has seized. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, all time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That title 5 of an act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 500. That on and after the day following the passage of this act, except as otherwise specially provided for in this title, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles named in this section when imported from any foreign country into the United States or any of its possessions, except the Philippine Islands, the islands of Guam and Tutuila, the Virgin Islands, and the Canal Zone, the rates of duties which are prescribed in this title, namely:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are we reading the bill by paragraphs or by sections?

The CHAIRMAN. This is not really a paragraph. The Clerk is really reading the bill by sections.

Mr. WALSH. No, Mr. Chairman; this is a revenue bill and it is read by paragraphs.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make the inquiry in order to ascertain when an amendment will be in order.

Mr. WALSH. Appropriation bills and revenue bills are read by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think this is even a paragraph.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I submit this bill should be read by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think this is a paragraph, even. This is an introductory statement that introduces the paragraph.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The Chair then rules that the bill is to be read by paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the Chair thinks so.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Chair permit a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Under the Chair's interpretation if this were an appropriation bill the result would be that no debate could be in order until a period had been read. Now, as the Chair well knows, when the grouping of words terminate with a colon or a semicolon put at the end of the line and the next line shall begin with a capital, it has been treated as a paragraph and debate is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair adheres to his former ruling. The Clerk will continue reading until the end of the paragraph on the bottom of the page.

The Clerk read as follows:

FREE LIST.

Group I. Acenaphthene, anthracene having a purity of less than 30 per cent, benzol, carbazol having a purity of less than 65 per cent, cumol, cymene, fluorene, methylanthracene, methylnaphthalene, naphthalene having a solidifying point less than 79° centigrade, pyridin, quinolin, toluol, xylol, dead or creosote oil, anthracene oil, pitch of coal tar, pitch of blast-furnace tar, pitch of oil-gas tar, pitch of water-gas tar, crude coal tar, crude blast-furnace tar, crude oil-gas tar, crude water-gas tar, all other distillates of any of these tars which on being subjected to distillation yield in the portion distilling below 190° centigrade a quantity of tar acids less than 5 per cent of the original distillate, all mixtures of any of these distillates and any of the foregoing pitches, and all other products that are found naturally in coal tar, whether produced or obtained from coal tar or other source, and not otherwise specially provided for in this title, shall be exempt from duty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I was unable in the brief time allowed me in general debate——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to suggest an amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last word. And I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have just read upon information the names of those who appear to have been the original incorporators of this philanthropic institution, the Chemical Foundation, Incorporated, and if that statement be accurate it traces back to one of the large concerns interested in the passage of this bill an interest in the Chemical Foundation, Incorporated, organized in the Alien Property Custodian's office, which ought to have the careful consideration of this House. I do not care how powerful a corporation is or how rich a man may be, the duty of the legislator is to see that he is not permitted, or it is not permitted, to deceive the public. A legislator has a great responsibility in matters of this kind, and the party man has a great responsibility here. By raising the dust, by raising the cry of patriotism—and Dr. Johnson once said that "patriotism was the last refuge of a scoundrel"—men who have designs upon the public can sometimes put through unfair legislation.

Now, Mr. Francis P. Garvan did appear before the Ways and Means Committee, and if you have read his testimony or that of Mr. Choate, of New York, you will observe that the inquiries made of those gentlemen were not in vain. They were particularly strong on patriotic endeavor. I have a speech here, made by Mr. Garvan. It was sent broadcast throughout the United States. He is an eloquent gentleman, powerful in New York, and of great influence as Alien Property Custodian. He talked to us about the humanity of this enterprise. This is the way he talked to people about it:

The Chemical Foundation answers this statement with a challenge, and if it can only become the coordinating forum for American patriotism, American sacrifice, and American ability, it awaits the issue with serenity.

It was going to be some corporation, this was—not only to have control of the dye industries of the United States but to take control of all American patriotism, American sacrifice, and American ability.

But Mr. Garvan proceeded to his peroration, and we can hear the welkin ring, as he said it:

Gentlemen, we are the boys who stayed at home. True, the reasons seemed sound and sufficient yesterday; but to-day they seem only excuses, ever decreasingly satisfying. It is not enough that with envious tears we cheer their homecoming.

This to the boys in the trenches while the Alien Property Custodian was putting over this proposition and signing up manufacturers to a protective tariff bill without informing them that there was a licensing feature in it. The Alien Property Custodian and the president of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), that had just taken to its bosom at private sale, without the public knowing anything about it, 4,500 patents which the Germans had taken out in the United States under our laws. They took that property over to themselves. They paid the Alien Property Custodian $250,000 for it. As I said the other day, one of those patents alone is worth $1,000,000 in royalties.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that these gentlemen have retained these patents for their own use?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For the purpose of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), which is to lease them out on royalty.

Mr. KNUTSON. In other words, they are holders of stolen goods?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not say that. But an emissary of the Foundation left the United States when the President was in Paris, and a clause went into the treaty that no German could recover anything that had been seized by the Alien Property Custodian in this country, nor would he ever have any claim for anything taken from him.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. Is there any evidence, so far as you know, of any discrimination by the Chemical Foundation in the licensing of these privileges?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I only know that my desk is full of complaints from manufacturers who state that they can not get dyestuffs they need to go on with their business, through the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), through the Du Ponts or the National Aniline Co., or any other concern in the United States. But I have information that certain combinations have been made with Great Britain by which dyes may be had.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have also information, which is pretty well backed up by common sense, that by keeping these dyes out of the United States and leaving them subject to disposition by the Supreme Allied Council over yonder in Paris or London, manufacturers in England can manufacture all the goods they want with these fast dyestuffs and sell them over here to the American public before we can get dyestuffs to make them, thus helping to close up our mills.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can the gentleman state the authority the Chemical Foundation has over the importation of dyes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has absolute control over the patents. Therefore those things that are made on the other side of the water which correspond to patents seized in the United States can not be brought into the United States. I said the other day that these men, when they were selling their stock, affected to hold everything here that the Germans had—that is, they represented to the public that they had nothing to fear from Germany as they were able to take care of themselves.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] questioned a statement made by me hypothetically the other day with respect to the price of dyestuffs. Here is a letter from the La France Manufacturing Co., which states—

PHILADELPHIA, PA., September 24, 1919.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Is there not something that can be done to make the law-making body of America appreciate the very serious and urgent need for our manufacturers to secure dyestuffs—especially those not made in this country?

All through the war, with its many burdens and hardships, we were glad to forget and pay any price the manufacturers saw fit to charge us, but as the war, technically, has been over for nearly a year, we are still placed in an embarrassing position and unable to get any supply of dye, no matter how willing we are to pay the price—business.

In our particular line we use patented blue, and no other color will answer our purpose, and during the war we paid from $12 to $24 a pound for this particular color, and for what little has been available since the war $12 a pound. During the last three months it has been impossible to get anything at all, and at the present writing we have only enough to last us for two days' work and can not get 100 pounds in the whole United States.

This means after five years' struggle to maintain our business and get this necessary article, which is an absolute essential with us, we will at last be forced to succumb and close our factory.

Last year our taxes to the Government amounted to $40,000. This the Government will lose, and all the time, thought, and energy we have spent in developing our business during the last 12 years will be sacrificed.

At all times I am for the protection of American manufacturers, but I do not believe they are justified in prohibiting the importation of goods which they do not manufacture or are unable to manufacture in sufficient quantities to take care of the demand.

As above stated, this patented blue is not manufactured in this country or, if so, in such limited quantities to be hopelessly inadequate to cover the demand. Therefore I believe we should have the privilege of bringing in such colors as are necessary for the maintaining of our business, especially when they are not manufactured in this country.

* * * * * * *

Thanking you in advance for your courteous attention to our needs, we are

Yours, very truly,

W. H. RICHMAN,
For LA FRANCE MANUFACTURING CO.

I can not read all of these letters in my time, but I am telling you what some of the users of manufactured dyes say in regard to the situation. You are hamstringing business men by imposing upon them a condition which puts their competitors in control of the raw material they use in their business.

Is this system working well? It did not work well during the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Five will do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All through the war our business men, enduring hardships and putting up with untold inconveniences while endeavoring to do business to help carry on the war, were obliged to come here to Washington, no matter whether their home station was in Texas or in California or in Massachusetts; they were obliged to come here and kowtow to a few men who were empowered by the President to regulate the whole business of the country.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the Alien Property Custodian officials have used their offices to acquire these German patents for themselves at the expense of the people of the United States, is there not a law by which they can be put into the Federal penitentiary? And if there is not such a law, will the gentleman help us pass a law that will put them there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that this power came through Executive order.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not matter how it came, if it is used to the disadvantage of the people.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Congress delegated certain power to the President, and the President took advantage of that delegation of power and assigned it to Mr. Polk, of the State Department, and Mr. Polk gave to Mr. Palmer, the Alien Property Custodian, an Executive order to sell these patents at private sale. That being the case, and these gentlemen of the Alien Property Custodian's office, using the vast property at their disposal for philanthropic and other purposes, went on and entered into this business. Claiming that this dystuff business was the key business of the Nation, seeing that billions of dollars of business depended upon it, they formed a combination, and they have that combination now. They are now in control of the business, and they are standing for the highest possible prices. The Alien Property Custodian did all this under Executive order, translated by the President to the Secretary of State, and by him assigned in the manner I have just described.

Mr. GARLAND and Mr. DEWALT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield first to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania said a few moments ago, with reference to taking over these 4,500 patents, that by the treaty of peace no reparation could be given at all to the owners of those patents. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, in the trading with the enemy act, as I remember it, the act itself provides that when these patents are taken over the patentees shall have certain rights reserved to them, and shall in the future, after peace is declared, be remunerated for the use of those patents in this country. Now, what I would like to know is whether the gentleman has any information as to whether the treaty of peace abrogates that portion of the act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have read the article which was carried abroad from the Alien Property Custodian's office by one of the attorneys thereof, and it provided, in substance, that no claim would ever lie—and this by treaty—against any department or bureau of the United States for any property that has been seized during the war, that no claim would rest.

Mr. DEWALT. Is it not true as a legal proposition that if the treaty is ratified it negatives this law, because all treaties passed subsequent to a law negatives the law?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman may be right. I think the gentleman is absolutely correct as to the treaty superseding the law.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. Here was a case presented to me the other day, where a German came to this country about seven years ago with a very favorable-appearing patent as to rubber, very light, one-fourth of the weight of cork, which could be put into use for any kind of work, and a lot of Americans took hold of that patent at the time, because they saw great value in it for Government use, and they did a lot of work in connection with it. The war came along, and it was seized by the Alien Property Custodian, and those people were unable to proceed with the work. The German to whom I referred left this country and is out of it entirely, but those people have men capable of doing the work. They learned recently that this patent referred to was under the control of a lot of New York lawyers, a company of New York lawyers. Then they wrote those lawyers, and the lawyers said they would have to pay 10 per cent royalty if they wanted to proceed with the work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that the hearings as to these dyestuffs are replete with lawyers and with experts and with bookkeepers and other people employed by the Alien Property Custodian, serving at salaries running up to a thousand dollars a month and more. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were expended in this way, and some of the men whose property was taken were told that if they were not good they would be sent to Fort Oglethorpe, and they did go to Fort Oglethorpe, and some of them have gone out of the country since.

If this treaty provision goes into effect, the owners of those patents will never get a cent from any claim that they may present against this Government. I do not want to see business men obliged to come to Washington from Buffalo or New Orleans or San Francisco or Seattle for a permit to get out some dyestuffs for calico in the spring trade. They ought not to be obliged to do that.

How is this scheme working in England? I am going to read to you from the Dyer, a trade paper published over yonder in England, showing just what they think about this system there, where this idea was born:

The commercial world is already irritated by the superabundance of red tape, and no Government department can carry on without it. Then there is the element of the unexpected. The Government official makes his own rules of the game of commerce as he goes along, and in homely phrase the business man complains very justly that "you never know where to have him."

Further on it says—

It is certainly a fact that all traders, except a small clique favored by actual conditions, are most anxious to see the final abolition of official meddling with commercial matters that never were, and never should be, within the sphere of Government attributes.

There is an appeal from the dye users in England to get rid of the hamstringing system that they have had over there since the war, and it is here proposed to fasten it on us in the United States, and say to the man who can not get dyes in the United States, "You wait. Be a patriot, close up your mills, discharge your employees until the Du Ponts and the National Aniline Co. can work out these patents of the Chemical Foundation Co. and get you the dyes you want." Our business men want what they want now. If they do not get it now, England being in possession of the dyes, Germany being in possession of the dyes, France being in possession of the dyes, England being in possession of the shipping and the high seas, their goods will come into this country, and we will close some of our mills waiting for dyes. [Applause.]

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LAYTON. It is not often that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] barks up a tree where there is no coon, but when he made the charge based upon this paper, that he had conclusively shown a connection between the E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. of Delaware and the Chemical Foundation Co., it was one of the flimsiest propositions that I think I ever laid my eyes on. As former secretary of state of the State of Delaware, and being perfectly familiar with the granting of charters, knowing all of the trust companies of the State whose duty it is to charter companies, I want to say that there are, I believe, at least four of these large chartering companies now housed under the roof of the Du Pont Building in the city of Wilmington. This is only one of them. I see the names of Clancy, Drew, and Knox. And what does the letter say? It says that May M. Clancy resided at a certain place in the city of Wilmington, and that she is an employee of the Corporation Trust Co. Why, the Corporation Trust Co. has nothing to do with the E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.; not as much as the Du Pont Co. has to do with the Delaware Charter Guaranty & Trust Co., which does a great deal of their chartering for them, I understand. If they were going to get a charter for the Chemical Foundation Co., I should suppose they would follow their usual custom and employ the trust company that they usually employ in chartering their various companies. It is the commonest thing, it is the regular thing, it has been the practice for the last 20 years, that when you charter a company in the State of Delaware, one of these trust companies sends down the names of three clerks or stenographers in their own office, three names that we call dummies. They send down the articles of incorporation, the secretary of state takes it and incorporates them and issues a certified copy which goes back at once to the trust company that sent the papers there. Then immediately the real incorporators, the people who are behind the charter, come forward and organize at once a corporation in their own names, and the three names which are sent to the office of the secretary of state are nothing except dummies. Under the Delaware corporation law it requires three names to the original certificate of incorporation, but these names are not one time in a hundred the actual incorporators where the incorporating company is a Delaware company. If it is an outside company, then generally they put in their own names, but they do not always do it even then.

Now, that is the only evidence that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has to connect the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co. with the Chemical Foundation Co. He might just as well take any one of the numerous charters that were granted last month in the State of Delaware and connect them up with the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co., for the names sent to the office of the secretary of state of the State of Delaware are office clerks for the most part. This paper only shows the names of the employees of the trust company that incorporated the company. It shows no connection under the sun between the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co. and the Chemical Foundation Co.

Mr. GARLAND. The State of Delaware never inquired very closely whether it was Du Ponts or anyone else that wanted a charter, did it?

Mr. LAYTON. No more than they would inquire from you.

Mr. GARLAND. Delaware gave charters that no other State would give to trusts and corporations, did it not?

Mr. LAYTON. Oh, no; there are plenty of States in the same general business.

Mr. GARLAND. They do not inquire much about anything, so long as they get the money.

Mr. LAYTON. They would incorporate a company to build a tramway to the moon if you wanted it. They are in the business of incorporating companies. I am not here to defend the morality of the State of Delaware in this matter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I made that statement on information. The gentleman states that these three persons named are dummies. I assumed that to be the fact, and that is the reason I put in the names, because so much had been said about the public spirit and the philanthropy of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), and it had been so readily accepted as a philanthropic institution and so loudly proclaimed as such by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that I thought it but fair to bring this information about the dummies who organized it to the attention of the House.

Mr. LAYTON. But I think my friend from Pennsylvania, in all fairness, ought to withdraw any imputation that he made on the basis of this paper. I stand here to assert that this is the usual way of chartering a corporation when a Delaware chartering company charters it. They take their own people, in their own office, and send in their three names, because the law requires them to have three names, and then the real parties in interest, in New York, Philadelphia, or Chicago, take the certified copy and hold their meeting and pass their by-laws and elect their own directors and so complete their incorporation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This matter becomes important only in this respect: It is claimed that the Chemical Foundation was organized by public-spirited men, although all of them were attached to the Alien Property Custodian office. Why did not they assume the responsibility of becoming incorporators themselves?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. FORDNEY. Reserving the right to object—and I do not object—permit me to say that I am going to insist hereafter that the debate be confined to the subject of the paragraph. We have read the free list, and gentlemen are discussing something that pertains not at all to the paragraph read. After the gentleman from Delaware has concluded his remarks, I am going to insist on the debate being confined to the subject that has been read.

Mr. LAYTON. I only want one minute to say that this seems to be the only paper substantiating the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and there is but one thing in it that would lend suspicion or color to that statement, and that is because the Corporation Trust Co. is housed in the Du Pont Building in Wilmington. That building covers lawyers, doctors, dentists, corporation trust companies, and every conceivable form of business. It is a great office building.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Delaware is one of the best-known men in that State. Does he know C. R. Mudge?

Mr. LAYTON. No, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether C. R. Mudge is a Du Pont attorney?

Mr. LAYTON. I never heard of him as such.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am informed that he is one of the gentlemen who took out the charter. This was supposed to be an independent and philanthropic concern.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended to 10 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from North Carolina permit me to say that if the gentleman is going to discuss the chemical foundation I wish he would discuss it under another paragraph and let us act first on this?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will gladly do so.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I will vote for this bill, licensing feature and all.

I have been accused of being the most independent Republican in this House, and I do not deny the charge.

I have oftentimes found myself at odds with the leaders of my party, especially upon questions of policy.

But upon the question of protection I find myself abreast of the most rampant protectionist in this House. I yield to no man in this House or elsewhere in my loyalty to the protective tariff policy. Protection and America are synonymous terms. My policy upon this subject is this: On every article needed in this country that we do not produce in sufficient quantities to satisfy our demands and can I would place a protective tariff high enough to insure its production in this country.

The American market is the best market in the world, and this market must be protected. Commercial jealousies have caused many wars, and one reason why we have been free from commercial wars is because we have the best market in the world.

We have found to our great surprise that Germany is recovering industrially and commercially more rapidly than any of our allies. We will come in direct competition with German labor. German fleets will soon be headed this way with German-made goods, which will come in direct competition with American-made goods. Are we going to do nothing about it? During the war the dye industry was established in this country, millions of dollars was invested in the industry, and many men were given employment in this industry. I am in favor of protecting this industry and destroying German competition until our dye industry is thoroughly established.

I would like to see this country in such a position so that if we had hostile fleets upon our Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts, and hostile armies upon our northern and southern borders we could live in spite of the world. This is my idea of preparedness, also.

I believe in a protective tariff high enough to protect American labor against foreign labor, and that we must have. The American workman demands more than the foreign workman. He wants better homes. He wants his children better educated. He wants all the necessities and conveniences of home life. He wants his home painted on the outside and papered on the inside. He feels himself the need of these things that the foreign workman does without. You may call it a Chinese wall, or you may call it selfishness, but I am for American labor first, last, and all the time as against the labor of any other country. [Applause.] The only thing that will make American labor better clothed, better fed, better housed, better educated than the labor of any other country in the world is by means of a protective tariff. [Applause.] Time and experience have proven this over and over again. I am in favor of protecting the dye industry, and I believe in placing such a tariff upon it as is necessary to insure its production in this country in sufficient quantities to satisfy our demands.

I shall vote for the licensing system because I believe at this time it is necessary. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 501. That on and after the day following the passage of this act, in addition to the duties provided in section 500, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles contained in Group II a special duty of 6 cents per pound, and upon all articles contained in Group III a special duty of 7 cents per pound: Provided, That the special duties herein provided for on colors, dyes, or stains, whether soluble or not in water, color acids, color bases, color lakes, leuco-acids, leuco-bases, indoxyl and indoxyl compounds, shall be based on standards of strength which shall be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that upon all importations of such articles which exceed such standards of strength the special duty of 7 cents per pound shall be computed on the weight which the article would have if it were diluted to the standard strength, but in no case shall any such articles of whatever strength pay a special duty of less than 7 cents per pound: Provided further, That beginning six months after the date of passage of this act no package containing any such color, dye, stain, color acid, color base, color lake, leuco-acid, leuco-base, indoxyl, or indoxyl compound shall be admitted to entry into the United States unless such package and the invoice shall bear a plain, conspicuous, and truly descriptive statement of the identity and percentage, exclusive of diluents, of such color, dye, stain, color acid, color base, color lake, leuco-acid, leuco-base, indoxyl, or indoxyl compound contained therein: And provided further, That beginning six months after the date of passage of this act, no packages containing any such article shall be admitted to entry into the United States if it or the invoice bears any statement, design, or device regarding such article or the ingredients of substances contained therein which is false, fraudulent, or misleading in any particular. In the enforcement of this section the Secretary of the Treasury shall adopt standards of strength which shall conform as nearly as practicable to the commercial strengths used in the United States prior to July 1, 1914.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this title.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have several perfecting amendments suggested by the Tariff Commission that I desire to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, after the word "dimethylamidophenol," insert "dimethyphenylbenzylanumonenimhydroxide."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, that is an amendment suggested by the Tariff Commission and also a change of policy; it simply adds the material which they think should be added to this group. I will put in the reason given by the Tariff Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 18, after the word "nitrobenzaldehyde," strike out "nitrobenzol."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the same argument holds good in this case as did in the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 21, strike out the word "phenylohydrazine" and insert in lieu thereof the word "phenylhydrazine."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, that is a mere change of spelling.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I see that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is not paying any attention to this amendment, and for and in his behalf I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the Chemical Foundation or the Du Ponts had anything to do with that amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Nobody had anything to do with it except the United States Tariff Commission.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is sure that the Du Ponts and the Chemical Foundation had absolutely no connection with the conception or framing of the amendment?

Mr. LONGWORTH. So far as my information goes, they have not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then I shall support it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, I desire to oppose the amendment that the gentleman from Ohio has offered. I thought he had yielded the floor.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I merely make the explanation that it is a change of spelling.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] because of the colloquy that has just taken place between him and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. The gentleman from North Carolina is endeavoring to prove up his case by the gentleman from Ohio, and the two have been in such close juxtaposition on this proposition that I fear anything that comes from either of them. The gentleman from North Carolina desires to know if the Du Ponts had anything to do with this suggestion offered by the gentleman from Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio answered "No." The gentleman from North Carolina asked if the celebrated philanthropic institution, the Chemical Foundation Co. (Inc.) had anything to do with it, and the gentleman from Ohio responded in the same manner. The gentleman from Ohio observed, however, that the suggestion for the amendment came from the Tariff Commission. Whether the Tariff Commission is hankering for the job of being the special commission to issue licenses for dyestuffs I do not know. I suspect, upon information, that the Tariff Commission rather desires to be free from the obligation of issuing licenses, and in support of that suspicion I read from an address to the American Chemical Society at Buffalo, by Mr. Culbertson, a distinguished member of the Tariff Commission, who disapproves of the licensing system in toto, and who said it should not apply to the United States. Mr. Culbertson, addressing the very gentlemen who are interested here, with reference to the British system, said:

She (Great Britain) has provided State aid for the dye industry in the form of loans and grants for buildings and research. The importation of all dyes is prohibited except under license granted by a licensing committee. No dye is to be imported which the domestic industry is able to supply or for which an adequate substitute is made in the country. I believe that such a plan has been suggested as desirable for this country. For my part, I can not regard it with favor. In Great Britain the plan is in the early stages of experimentation. There the firms are comparatively few, and the Government is closely associated with them in the enterprise.

They subsidize them there.

In the United States our industry is too diversified and varied, the problems of administration too vast, the political consideration too uncertain to warrant meeting the dye problem with prohibition, importation, licenses, and direct Federal supervision.

The alternative is a tariff which will equalize, with a fair margin, the conditions of competition between this country and abroad.

There is the testimony of the Tariff Commission for whom the gentleman from Ohio offers the amendment, which now, on behalf of the Tariff Commission, I oppose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 3, line 25, after the word "acid," strike out "thiocarbanili" and insert "thiocarbanilid."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, that is the mere addition of the letter "d" at the end of the word.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Tariff Commission explaining the need for these changes and such other technical changes that I shall later suggest.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, August 5, 1919.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LONGWORTH: In connection with H. R. 8078, now pending before the House of Representatives, I desire on behalf of the United States Tariff Commission to call your attention to the following suggestions of amendments or questions involving modifications of the original policy, which may seem desirable to Congress in view of changes in the situation which have occurred since the signing of the armistice:

(2) The commission suggests the following amendment: On page 8, line 8, after the figure "5," add the figures "14" and "29."

Paragraph 14 of the act of 1913 reads as follows: "14. Calomel, corrosive sublimate, and other mercurial preparations, 15 per cent ad valorem."

Mercuric salicylate is a drug of minor importance, which is in part of coal-tar origin, and is described in general terms in H. R. 8078 as a "medicinal * * * obtained, derived or manufactured in whole or in part from any of the products provided for in Group I and II," and is also covered by paragraph 14 as a "mercurial preparation."

This suggested amendment introduces no new principle, but merely insures that this case will be treated exactly like other similar cases.

A parallel case is found in paragraph 29 of the act of 1913 which provides in part: "* * * ethers and esters of all kinds not specially provided for in this section, 20 per cent ad valorem."

Some of the products provided for in this bill, including drugs, intermediates, dyes, medicinals, flavors, and photographic chemicals, may also be described in chemical terms as ethers or esters, so that there is possible conflict between the two acts.

(3) The commission further suggests that the words "standards of strength" be stricken out of line 17, on page 7, of H. R. 8078, and that the words "a standard of strength for each dye or other product" be substituted therefor, and that the words "strengths used," in line 18, be changed to "strength in ordinary use." These changes will make the sentence read: "In the enforcement of this section the Secretary of the Treasury shall adopt a standard of strength for each dye or other product which shall conform as nearly as practicable to the commercial strength in ordinary use in the United States prior to July 1, 1914."

It is believed that these slight changes in language will make the original intent clearer.

The word "standards" was used in the plural sense because there were many different dyes, so that no single standard would do for all. On the other hand, it was intended that there should be a single standard for a given dye even in cases where several different strengths appeared on the market, and that the standard should conform to the strength chiefly or ordinarily used. In some cases a dye was sold and used in an "ordinary" quality or strength and also in a "double" or "extra" strength.

(4) The commission further suggests that page 3, line 12, after the word "dimethyl amidophenol" the word "dimethylphenylbenzylammonium hydroxide" should be inserted. The purpose of this is to cover certain products used for discharge printing on textiles dyed with indigo or vat colors, thus producing white or yellow stripes or designs on a colored background. These products were formerly sold under trade names controlled by Germans, especially as Leucotrope O and Leucotrope W. At the time the original report of the Tariff Commission was prepared the chemical composition of these products was not known to the commission, and since they had no name in commercial use except their trade names a satisfactory designation of them could not be devised. It is objectionable and ineffective to describe goods in the tariff law by trade or brand names, since such names can be properly applied only to the products of a single firm, and the goods might easily and legally be imported under some other name. It has lately been brought to our attention that these products are mixtures consisting of dimethylphenylbenzylammonium hydroxide (or sulphonic acid derivatives thereof), which is a coal-tar product, and sodium formaldehyde sulphoxylate and zinc oxide. By adding the coal-tar ingredient by name to Group II Leucotrope or its equivalent by whatever name sold will be dutiable under the clause on page 4, line 19, which reads "all mixtures, including solutions, consisting in whole or in part of any of the foregoing."

(5) The commission also desires to call attention to the following questions, which involve a question of policy, but without making a recommendation.

Perfumery and perfume materials. Materials of the coal-tar origin are not covered by the act of September 8, 1916, or H. R. 8078. The tariff act of October 3, 1913, contains the following provisions:

"48. Perfumery, including cologne and other toilet waters, articles of perfumery, whether in sachets or otherwise, and all preparations used as applications to the hair, mouth, teeth, or skin, such as cosmetics, dentrifrices, including tooth soaps, pastes, including theatrical grease paints, and pastes, pomades, powders, and other toilet preparations, all the foregoing if containing alcohol, 40 cents per pound and 60 per cent ad valorem; if not containing alcohol, 60 per cent ad valorem; floral or flower waters containing no alcohol, not specially provided for in this section, 20 per cent ad valorem.

"49. Ambergris, enfleurage greases, and floral essences by whatever method obtained; flavoring extracts, musk, grained or in pods, civet, and all natural or synthetic odoriferous or aromatic substances, preparations, and mixtures used in the manufacture of, but not marketable as, perfumes or cosmetics; all the foregoing not containing aclohol and not specially provided for in this section, 20 per cent ad valorem."

In addition certain other perfume materials of natural origin are specifically mentioned elsewhere in the act of 1913, especially in paragraph 46.

Commercial perfumery is made by mixing or compounding various natural odoriferous substances such as various balsams, essential oils, floral essences, animal products (musk, civet, etc.), and synthetic chemicals with each other and a suitable solvent (usually alcohol) and a suitable fixative. Other vehicles such as talcum powder and cold cream are also extensively used.

Some of the synthetic chemicals used are of coal-tar origin and others are not derived directly or indirectly from coal tar. These perfume chemicals are as a rule complex substances which are difficult and expensive to make; they must be of the highest purity and quality and they have a small market. For these reasons they are very expensive—only a few of them can be bought as low as $1 per pound, and prices above $25 per pound are common and even sales at $100 per pound are not unknown.

The manufacture of perfumery and perfumed materials is divided into two distinct branches—(1) manufacturers and dealers in perfume materials, and (2) manufacturers who purchase their materials and mix, bottle, advertise, and distribute the finished perfumery or other perfumed toilet articles to the retail trade.

In the preparation of the report of the Tariff Commission, dated December 12, 1918, suggesting a revision of title 5 of the act of September 8, 1916, perfumery materials were purposely left out because Congress had apparently clearly expressed an intent to leave them dutiable under the tariff act of 1913. Perfume materials of coal-tar origin are, however, so closely allied to drugs and flavors of similar origin that they might logically be included with them. There are materials such as methylsalicylate which may be used as drugs, flavors, or perfumes. Benzyl benzoate and benzyl acetate are worthy of special mention by name because in addition to their use as drugs and perfumes they were found during the war to be useful as a solvent for the varnish used on airplane wings and large amounts were made for this purpose. The material used for this purpose does not require to be of high quality necessary for use in medicine or perfumery, and, therefore, it is suggested that these two substances be mentioned by name in order to forestall a claim by an importer that the materials are not perfume materials, but solvent for airplane varnish.

If Congress desires to include perfume materials in Group III, the following amendments to H. R. 8078 will accomplish this purpose:

Insert, on page 5, line 17, of H. R. 8078, after the word "flavors," the following: "* * * benzyl acetate, benzyl benzoate, synthetic odoriferous or aromatic substances, preparations, and mixtures, used in the manufacture of, but not marketable as perfumes and cosmetics and not containing alcohol";

Add to the repealing clause, page 8, line 8, after the figure "46" the figure "49."

On page 5, line 2, after the word "flavors," insert the words "synthetic materials for perfumes and cosmetics."

(6) There is one other matter on which Congress expressed very clearly a definite policy in the act of September 8, 1916, which it may wish to reconsider in view of later developments. In the present law phenol is placed in Group II on the dutiable list, whereas cresol, which is closely allied to phenol, is placed on the free list. Both phenol (or crystal carbolic acid) and cresol (or cresylic acid or liquid carbolic acid) are found naturally in coal tar and are commercially derived from this source as joint products in the treatment of coal tar for the recovery of its valuable constituents. They have many uses in common. The distinction between them, which is of the greatest commercial significance, is that phenol was used on an enormous scale in the recent war as a raw material for the manufacture of the high-explosives picric acid and ammonium picrate, which are important shell fillers. Cresol, on the other hand, was used only in relatively insignificant amounts in the manufacture of explosives. As a consequence, the supply of natural phenol from coal tar was entirely inadequate and an enormous synthetic phenol industry was developed in the United States during the war, although no such factories existed in the United States at the outbreak of the European war. During 1918 over 106,000,000 pounds were made in the United States. The difference in the treatment of phenol and cresol in the tariff act of September 8, 1916, was obviously intended to protect and encourage the new synthetic phenol industry and found ample justification on military grounds.

The conditions which have arisen since the signing of the armistice are, however, so radically different that Congress may wish to reconsider this policy. The new synthetic phenol industry had been so successful that soon after the signing of the armistice the stocks of phenol on hand in the United States were so large that it will probably require from three to five years to consume them for peace-time purposes. The price quickly dropped from about 45 cents to about 8 cents, and all the factories shut down, and it is very doubtful if they will ever open again. Natural phenol will, of course, continue to be made and may supply the entire demand as it did before the war. The best that can be hoped for is that after allowing three years or more for the disposal of surplus stocks a small fraction of the existing plant capacity may be utilized. Under these changed circumstances Congress may wish to reconsider the policy of making a difference between phenol and cresol and put them on an equality either on the free list in Group I or on the dutiable list in Group II.

The commission expresses no opinion on the matter of policy involved, but merely presents for the convenience of Congress the facts having a bearing on the subject. A prominent American manufacturer of phenol and cresol from coal tar urges that cresol should be placed on the dutiable list along with phenol, and in support of this contention urges the following arguments: (a) Phenol and cresol are obtained as joint products in the treatment of coal tar, and if the argument based on the protection of the synthetic phenol industry is no longer regarded as valid, the two products should be given equal treatment under the tariff. (b) The recovery of phenol and cresol from coal tar is more complex and expensive than the recovery of other crude coal-tar products, such as benzol, toluol, and crude naphthalene. (c) At the present time there is much phenol and cresol which is not commercially recovered from the various coal-tar distillates, because it has not been profitable to do so in the past in competition with imported phenol and cresol; but the imposition of a duty on cresol and the retention of a duty on phenol would make it profitable to install and operate the necessary equipment at tar distilleries. On the other hand, it should be pointed out that cresol or cresylic acid is an important raw material for the manufacture of disinfectants, including disinfectant soaps and sheep dips, as well as in the manufacture of synthetic resins and a great variety of other products.

Cresol and cresylic acid or crude carbolic acid have been regularly imported in substantial amounts, chiefly from England. It therefore seems probable that to transfer cresol and cresylic acid to the dutiable list would increase the cost to the consumers of these products, and if it resulted in a lesser use of disinfectants, might even react unfavorably on the public health. Although it is probably true that the recovery of cresol from coal tar is somewhat more difficult than the recovery of some of the crude products, nevertheless, as compared with most intermediates classified in Group II, cresol can be made easily and cheaply and is regularly sold at prices substantially below the price of most intermediates.

Attention is called to the fact that if any change is made in the present policy, either by changing phenol to the free list or by adding cresol to the dutiable, further amendments should be made to the specifications which distinguish between distillates which shall be dutiable and those which are free. The specifications in H. R. 8078 are drawn for the purpose of insuring that distillates containing large amounts of phenol shall be dutiable, but that distillates which contain cresol instead of phenol as their most important ingredient shall be free.

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS WALKER PAGE,
Vice Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Group III. All colors, dyes, or stains, whether soluble or not in water, color acids, color bases, color lakes, leuco-acids and leuco-bases whether colorless or not, indoxyl and indoxyl compounds; ink powders; photographic chemicals; acetanilid suitable for medicinal use, acetphenetidin, acetylsalicylic acid, antipyrine, benzaldehyde suitable for medicinal use, benzoic acid suitable for medicinal use, betanaphthol suitable for medicinal use, phenolphthalein, resorcin, suitable for medicinal use, salicylic acid and its salts, suitable for medicinal use, salol, and other medicinals; sodium benzoate; saccharin, methylsalicylate, coumarin, and other flavors; synthetic phenolic resin and all resinlike products prepared from phenol, cresol, phthalic anhydride, coumarone, indene, or from any other article or material provided for in Group I or II, all of these products whether in a solid, semisolid, or liquid condition; synthetic tanning materials; picric acid, trinitrotoluol, and other explosives except smokeless powders; all of the foregoing when obtained, derived, or manufactured in whole or in part from any of the products provided for in Group I or II; natural alizarin and natural indigo, and colors, dyes, stains, color acids, color bases, color lakes, leuco-acids, leuco-bases, indoxyl, and indoxyl compounds obtained, derived, or manufactured in whole or in part from natural alizarin or natural indigo; natural methyl salicylate or oil of wintergreen or oil of sweet birch; natural coumarin; and all mixtures, including solutions, consisting in whole or in part of any of the articles or materials provided for in this group, 45 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has attempted to muddy the waters in connection with this bill. He has talked and talked on the Chemical Foundation and the Du Ponts. If we Democrats and Republicans really want to vote on the merits of this bill with the facts before us, we should dispel from our minds at once any thought of the Chemical Foundation Co. or the Du Ponts. If the Chemical Foundation was organized by a gang of crooks, instead of, as it was, by as honest and as patriotic men as there are in the United States, it would have absolutely nothing to do with the provisions of this bill.

If the Chemical Foundation had never been heard of, if the German patents had never been heard of, if the Du Ponts had never been heard of, this or a bill similar would have been introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and reported out just as this bill was. At the hearings Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania examined Mr. Garvan, president of the foundation, and Mr. Choate, its attorney, in the hope of finding some evidence upon which to ground his suspicions. Every man on the committee knows, and Mr. MOORE ought to know, that not a word of testimony or evidence by documents was produced to justify his suspicions; but, on the contrary, all the evidence disproved beyond a shadow of a doubt any ground of the slightest suspicion. The foundation or its officers are not before you for trial in this bill. What the foundation or its officers did or what Mr. MOORE thinks of it or them has absolutely nothing to do with this bill.

The question is whether the tariff rates in this bill should become law, and whether the dye industry shall have the additional protection of a license for its maintenance for the next two years—during the transition from abnormal to normal period—whether it should have such protection or not. Some favor both propositions in the bill. Some favor the rates in the bill and oppose the license feature of it. Some oppose both. I oppose both the high, exorbitant rates in the bill, which if passed will be permanent unless repealed, and the peculiar kind of license provisions in the bill. But I protest against the unjust insinuations and imputations against the officers of the Chemical Foundation.

This letter that Mr. MOORE produced here in his dramatic way leaves the House under the impression that he had a big sensation to spring upon us. He wanted to remind "Mr. KITCHIN, of North Carolina, what had just reached" him, and that he knew "if Mr. KITCHIN, of North Carolina, had had the information contained in the letter" that he would not be so favorably impressed with the foundation. He then read the letter, and read it hurriedly. There never was a greater masterpiece of fraud and deception perpetrated upon anybody than did the gentleman who handed Mr. MOORE this letter perpetrate upon him. The Du Pont stenographers, the Du Pont employees, the Du Pont dummies, incorporators of the Chemical Foundation! cried the gentleman after reading the letter. If Mr. MOORE will carefully read the letter, he will discover that he found simply a mare's nest. There is not a word in the entire letter—I have it before me—that in the slightest sustains such ejaculations, not a line that shows that Du Pont, or the Du Pont Co., or any of its stenographers or any of its employees, ever saw or heard of a charter for the Chemical Foundation or ever knew or heard of the incorporation. The distinguished gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON], who was formerly secretary of state of Delaware, through whose hands all the charters in the State of Delaware went, explained in his remarks a moment ago the entire regularity of the charter and how the incorporators were named, and that they had no connection whatever with the Du Pont Co. Why, Mr. MOORE got it into his head some way that because the word Du Pont is used in the letter that those three stenographers were the Du Pont stenographers.

The only connection that they had with the Du Ponts or the Du Pont Co. was that the Corporation Trust Co., the company that drew and prepared the charter of the foundation, a company engaged in the business of preparing Delaware charters for parties throughout the United States, and whose stenographers and employees were named as incorporators in the foundation charter, as is quite usual in such cases, under the laws of Delaware, as explained by Mr. LAYTON, occupied offices in the Du Pont Building, as do dozens of other parties and companies, including other trust and chartering companies. The nominal incorporators, as the letter shows, were not employees of the Du Pont Co., had no connection with such company. But Mr. MOORE thinks that anybody who has an office in the Du Pont Building is connected with and belongs to the Du Pont Dye Co. I remember twice in my life I stayed all night in this Du Pont Building, but if I had thought Mr. MOORE, by reason of this, was going to accuse me of being under the influence of or belonging to the Du Ponts or the Du Pont Co., I would have slept on the streets all night. [Laughter.] Anybody who has been to Wilmington, Del., knows that the Du Pont Building is a tremendous building, covering perhaps a block, and half of it is a hotel, one of the finest hotels in this country, and the other half is composed of offices, shops on the first floor, and the upper floors are occupied as offices for lawyers, trust companies, and business firms by the dozens. Because these stenographers, the nominal incorporators of the Chemical Foundation, happen to work for some company that happens to have offices in the Du Pont Building, why, they all belong to the Du Pont Co., and therefore you should defeat this or that provision in the bill. [Laughter.] Why, the gentleman who signs this mare's-nest letter is an importer of dyes. I know him to be a very clever, courteous, and honest gentleman, and one of the best informed men in the United States on dyestuffs. He is not a manufacturer of dyes; he is not a manufacturer of textiles; he is a dye importer, and represents, and ably and honestly represents, a big French dye company.

Mr. MOORE, if he had read the letter carefully, ought to have known that it contained no evidence that the incorporators had any connection whatever with the Du Pont Co.; none in the world. Why, those three persons, those identical three persons, under the laws of Delaware are permitted to be named as incorporators, and their names are no doubt attached to hundreds of charters. Every charter practically that this corporation trust company gets out for parties throughout the United States bears those three names, the persons in the employ of such company, who doubtless appear as nominal incorporators. Then they turn the whole thing over to the real incorporators, which you can do under the laws of Delaware. Why, suppose you wanted to charter a college or university or any other eleemosynary institution or an orphan asylum or a church. Under the method of getting out a charter in the State of Delaware this same procedure would be followed, such as described by the distinguished gentleman from Delaware, and if this trust company was employed to prepare the charter those three persons would no doubt be named just exactly like they were named in the Chemical Foundation charter, and then Mr. MOORE would get up and say, "Yes, that orphan asylum, that church, that college, or that university belongs to the Du Pont Co." [Laughter.] "Clancy, Drew, Knox—stenographers and employees of the Du Ponts—are the incorporators." [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that after the five minutes is used by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that the debate close in 16 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, as I said in my remarks this morning, this House ought not to permit these unfounded aspersions upon the Chemical Foundation and its officers by Mr. MOORE to have a feather's weight with it in its consideration of this bill. Now, under the charter, under the agreement as written and recorded—and it is the condition under which Mr. Palmer, the Alien Property Custodian, only would permit the foundation to purchase these patents—the dye manufacturers and other manufacturers interested in dyes, in their consumption and production, who put up the money for the stock, have no control whatever over the patents any more than I have. Every time stock is issued that stock is turned over to the trustees, with the sole voting power, who are to hold it until 1936—17 years—when the patents would expire and anyone could use them. These trustees, to whom every dollar of stock issued must be turned over, and who at this minute have in their possession every dollar of the stock, have not one penny's worth of interest in the stock and have not one penny's worth of interest in the operation of the Chemical Foundation. They have not one penny's interest in the salary, for not one of them gets or will get a salary.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield? What assurance is there at any place that anybody can get one of these licenses?

Mr. KITCHIN. The parties who put up the capital stock get and can get only 6 per cent by the terms of the charter. That 6 per cent will be met by a small royalty on the license—a permit to use the patents—to every manufacturer of dyes in the United States, big or little; to every man who wants to manufacture dyes, if he is an American citizen. These trustees must issue a license or permit to use the patents by the terms of the charter and agreement on equal terms, at an equal royalty, and with equal conditions.

Gentlemen, in my judgment there never was a set of Americans who ever got together with purer or more patriotic motives to serve the industries of the United States and to serve the people and the Government of the United States than these gentlemen who promoted the Chemical Foundation and who are trustees and officers. I specially include Mr. Garvan, the president, whom Mr. MOORE has so unjustly and unwarrantedly attacked. [Applause.] There is not a Republican or Democrat here who knows me who does not believe I have sufficient sense, after a study and investigation, if there was any reason for suspicion, to detect it somewhere. And I tell you I have examined this thing from top to bottom. In none of the evidence, in none of the papers—and I have had the charter and read it, and I have had the articles of agreement and read them, and I have read the form of license or permit, I have heard the officers examined and took part in it—have I been able to find one iota of evidence that casts the least bit of reflection on the Chemical Foundation or its officers and trustees.

Here are hundreds of pages of the hearings. Four-fifths of them consist of Mr. MOORE's cross-examination of the officers of this institution. I challenge Mr. MOORE to point to one line, to one word, in all that testimony that would give the ground for the slightest suspicion in any respect upon the character, upon the patriotism, upon the motives of these gentlemen, or that shows in any way that this Chemical Foundation is being used for commercial purposes by a human being connected with it. But all the evidence, on the contrary, shows that in the promotion and operation of the Chemical Foundation they have shown the finest and most disinterested patriotism and the sincerest purpose and effort to make the Chemical Foundation an instrument to serve the interests of all the manufacturers alike and to serve the best interests of the Government and the people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point here is this: That the Alien Property Custodian and his associates interested in the organization of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) made it appear to the committee that it was wholly philanthropic, with no selfish interest, although stock was to be sold up to $500,000 at $1,000 a share. It is significant, having high-sounding names from New York, principally banking men, as managers, who are supposed to be operating in the interest of the public, that it should have been organized in the Du Pont Building, next door to the Du Pont office, in the city of Wilmington, Del., by three stenographers, who are admitted to be dummies, and that the attorney acting for the concern and asking for a charter should be C. R. Mudge, said to have acted for the Du Ponts. That is the whole story. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not care at this time to discuss the matter of the Chemical Foundation, which I think has been pretty well gone over.

The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] announced to-day that at the conclusion of the submission of this bill he proposed to make a motion to recommit, lowering the duties that are provided herein; and incidentally, in connection with his remarks with reference to the duties in the bill, he took a great deal of credit to himself and to the Democratic Party, especially the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, for the protection which was given in 1916 to this industry, which, he said, was the first which had in any case been given. Apparently he would have the House to understand that it was proposed and carried through by the Democrats of the House.

I have been very much pleased to watch the progress of the gentleman from North Carolina in protection measures. A few days ago he offered an amendment to a bill proposing the former rates which were carried in the Payne bill, and argued at great length that they ought to be adopted. I remember at one time hearing him make a speech denouncing that very bill. Here to-day he takes credit for himself and his colleagues upon the Democratic side for putting through the tariff of 1916 upon dyestuffs. Let me say, for the information of the Republican Members who were not here at that time, that the late Ebenezer J. Hill, of Connecticut, formerly a distinguished Republican Member of this House and a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, was the man who prepared what was known as the Hill bill, which became the first protective measure which was passed by this Congress with reference to dyestuffs. The bill which he introduced carried rates nearly double what were finally put through, because the Democratic majority on the committee insisted upon reducing them, and they cut them down almost one-half.

Now, it is said that those rates have worked very well. So they did, during the war, which imposed an absolute embargo upon all German dyes. Not a pound, not a particle of dyes could come over here during the war.

But how will those duties work after the war? That will best be understood if gentlemen will turn to pages 137 and 138 of the hearings and examine a letter written by one Hugo Schweitzer, a German agent, to Count von Bernstorff, the former German Ambassador. It was written in 1917 with reference to the provisions in the Hill bill, and in that letter Hugo Schweitzer stated that it would be merely "child's play" for the German industry to wipe out the American producers of dyes after the war ceased, for, he said, under those rates it would be impossible for the American manufacturer ever to develop vat dyes; it would be impossible to manufacture some of the intermediates; and they would crush this industry completely shortly after peace was declared.

For that reason we have thought proper to raise these duties to the point expressed in this bill.

Now, are these rates too high? There are some 80 different concerns manufacturing dyes in this country, all in competition with each other. Even if all German dyes could be excluded—and they can not at present be excluded because there are certain kinds not manufactured in this country—competition would bring the level of prices down to a proper point, and they would be manufactured, as we believe, under this measure in time lower that they were ever offered by Germany.

This is a Republican tariff measure. So far as the tariff rates in the bill are concerned, however much controversy there may be as to other features, there has never been a particle of objection either on the part of the users of the dyes or the makers of the dyes. They are satisfactory to both. This measure will build up the industry and protect it from German competition and in the long run enable the consumer to purchase dyes lower than ever before. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who is about to be translated to another, if not a better, sphere, has, I fear, unintentionally, of course, created a misunderstanding as to just what effect this bill has upon the so-called Chemical Foundation. As a matter of fact, gentlemen, this bill has nothing whatever to do with the Chemical Foundation. The Chemical Foundation controls certain patents and its only function is to license those patents for the manufacture of dyes in this country. It has nothing whatever to do with the importation of dyes from any other country with which this so-called license commission will deal. Now, I hold no brief for the Chemical Foundation. I do realize, however, the situation with which this Government was confronted during the war. There were some 4,500 German patents taken out in this country relating to a vast number of coal-tar, medicinal, and other products. Only a comparatively few of those patents deal with dyes at all. Here was the situation. This Government had just as much right to take those German patents as it had to take German-owned ships, German-owned buildings, and to take control of corporations the stock of which was owned by Germans. Suppose the Government had not taken them? Then we would have been deprived of the opportunity of using any of them here. Having taken them over, then, what disposition ought to be made of them? Ought these patents be offered at public sale? If so, then there would have been an opportunity for a real monopoly, because one great concern could have bought all of them. The only recourse left was to acquire them by means of some agency and license them to American citizens who showed their ability to manufacture these things in America.

Now, so far as the question of monopoly is concerned, gentlemen, these patents at most deal with less than one-fifth of the dyes which are being produced in this country and for which there is any demand. The other four-fifths are not covered by German patents. So the licensing of these patents to American citizens simply gives them the opportunity and the information necessary to make certain dyes which are not now made in this country.

So far as the question of a monopoly is concerned, take the case of salvarsan, to which I alluded a little while ago. That was a most valuable patent. The Chemical Foundation took hold of that patent and licensed its use, I think, to five different American manufacturers. What has been the result? Before the war Germany sold that article to the United States for $3.50 a dose. Since Americans have been making it under these licenses the price has been reduced to 40 cents a dose. Is there any monopoly in that?

Mr. HUSTED. I should like to ask the gentleman if any American manufacturer can obtain a license from this Chemical Foundation without any discrimination or selection on their part?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Absolutely without discrimination. Any American concern merely has to show that they are 100 per cent American and that they have the facilities for making these things.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this title.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, to-morrow two addresses will be delivered in the room of the Committee on Revision of Laws, and I wish that every Member could hear them, especially every lawyer. I am calling attention to it in the hope that a large number of lawyers may be present. At 10 o'clock to-morrow, at the room of the Revision of Laws Committee, the addresses will be made. If any large number comes, we have arranged to meet in the Naval Committee room. Judge Charles M. Hough, of the Circuit Court of Appeals of New York City, and H. M. Wailes, managing editor of the Federal Statutes Annotated, will address us on the revision of statutes. I wish to put this in the RECORD, and I hope there will be a considerable number of lawyers present, because they will find the addresses interesting and valuable.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania has a motion to strike out, and I desire to offer a few perfecting amendments. In the first place, I ask unanimous consent that on page 7, line 21, the Clerk be authorized to spell "regulations" correctly.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I offer these perfecting amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 3, after the word "leuco-acid" strike out "deuco-base" and insert "leuco-base."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman should first ask unanimous consent to return to that paragraph. We have read lines 20, 21, and 22, and this is an amendment to the preceding paragraph.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was about to offer an amendment when I rose to offer my amendment and the Clerk read the next paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. But that makes no difference. The Clerk read the next paragraph, and there has been five minutes' debate by the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. Technically the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct. However, I think the gentleman from Ohio was asking for recognition.

Mr. WALSH. That does not cure it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the request for unanimous consent to return to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to return to the preceding paragraph. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Page 7, line 3, after the word "leuco-acid" strike out "deuco-base" and insert "leuco-base."

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. Of course, I am going to support the amendment because it is offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who desires to strengthen the measure. It may surprise my Republican friends for me to say that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is absolutely correct in his contention that the Chemical Foundation, no matter how it was organized or who constituted it, has absolutely no bearing upon the issues presented by this bill. But I can not agree with the gentleman from North Carolina as to the conclusions reached by him that the present American dye industry is the result of the tariff act of 1916. What dye industry there is in the United States to-day is here because of the allied blockade of Germany, resulting practically in the exclusion of German dyes. The investment to-day, it is said, represents over $300,000,000. The industry employs thousands of skilled chemists and tens of thousands of other laborers. Far transcending in importance any consideration or comparison of invested capital and labor employed is the national interest involved. The upbuilding of the dye industry is a matter of deepest national concern. The Great World War demonstrated to every thoughtful American that this Nation must never again be found dependent upon another country, especially Germany, for so vital a commodity. Germany's supremacy as a dye-producing nation had been universally conceded. Seventy-five per cent and upward of the world's supply came from Germany until the outbreak of the present war. Over 90 per cent of our dye importations came from Germany. The industry in America had received scanty encouragement and made but little progress. German agents were active in our chemical industries. The propaganda of the Fatherland was everywhere. Our textile industries, and even the Government itself, seemed to doubt the ability of Americans to produce dyes on a par with German quality. Prominent Americans, deceived by German propaganda, declared that to Germany belonged the dye industry as a natural monopoly.

This propaganda influences yet to-day innocent and well-meaning Americans. If you are to assume, as has been suggested here in debate, that our textile manufacturers must look elsewhere for perfect dyes, then Germany wins. No more serious or unjust indictment could be laid at the doors of American chemists. A dye consists of a chemical combination, and a dye is a dye. It is just the same chemical combination whether it is made in Philadelphia or Berlin.

In the early developments impurities affected the finished commodity, but there are being produced in America to-day 241 staple dyes that are of just as perfect quality as the best dyes ever produced in Germany. There is not the slightest reason for hesitancy on the part of anyone to accept the proposition that Americans are able to manufacture dyes on a par with German quality. An instance has been cited here of clothing dyed apparently with an imperfect commodity. In answer let me suggest that early in the war dyes were so scarce that German agents in this country charged the fabulous sums suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], as high as $10 per pound for indigo. To-day Americans are manufacturing indigo and selling it at 65 cents. During the emergency textile manufacturers made use of every available supply. They could not get what they wanted and they were obliged to dye their woolens with dyes intended for cotton textiles only. They were obliged to use upon their silks dyes intended to be used only upon woolens. Cheap varieties were also imported from Japan. It was this situation which caused textile manufacturers to refrain from guaranteeing fastness of their colors.

Again I repeat that Americans are now manufacturing 241 staple dyes of the purest quality known to chemical science, and if their Government gives them sufficient protection and encouragement within two years every dye known to Germany will be produced in equal quality in the United States. Shall our country be self-sustaining or shall it depend upon a foreign country?

Germany with her designs for world conquest fully realized the value of the dye industry. Poisonous war gases developed by her chemists and produced in her immense dye plants came near forcing the English Channel in 1915. Her superiority in gas and availability of supply made possible her effective drive in March, 1918, and the great advances in May and June of the same year, which caused the world for a time to doubt whether the German armies could be stayed. Her great dye factories prolonged the war; cost the Allies millions in lives and billions in treasure. Thirty per cent of the American casualties resulted from poisonous gas manufactured in the dye plants of Germany.

The industry is founded in the field of organic chemistry. Synthetic dyes, which comprise over 95 per cent of all dyes produced—only 5 per cent are natural or vegetable dyes—are coal-tar products. In the manufacture of coke, for instance, certain crude by-products are produced. The process of transforming these crudes into intermediates and the intermediates into finished dyes involves the keenest problems known to chemical science. The final process, step, or combination determines whether the intermediates are transformed into explosives, poisonous gases, or into beautiful dyes, fragrant perfumes, or pharmaceutical preparations.

Persuasive argument can be advanced that as an economic proposition America should have a dye industry sufficient at least to supply her national needs. With her unlimited quantities of coal it is the natural field for the dye industry. We have everything that is required in the way of raw material. We have the skill and genius. Experience is the essential in which we are handicapped.

For years this country was hampered and impeded by German patents, which were taken out in the United States with no intention of using them here, but solely for the purpose of preventing others from making such use. These patents, numbering about 4,500, were seized by the Alien Property Custodian and sold to the Chemical Foundation, to be held in trust and for the use of American chemical industry. If that trust is carried out in full American spirit, then one of the greatest handicaps to which American genius and skill have been subjected will have been removed. We have the assurance from the present Attorney General of the United States and former Alien Property Custodian, Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, who seized and sold to the Chemical Foundation these German patents, that such a policy may be expected from the foundation.

I quote from Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer as follows:

> The suggestion was met with an instantaneous and enthusiastic approval, and, as a result, a corporation has been organized, to be known as the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), in which practically every important American manufacturer will be a stockholder, the purpose of which is to acquire by purchase these German patents and to hold them as a trustee for American industry * * * for the advancement of chemical and allied science and industry in the United States * * * and the charter is so framed that under the patents nonexclusive licenses only can be granted on equal terms to all proper applicants.

And again:

> The combination was not objectionable to public policy, since it was so organized that any genuine American, whether a stockholder of the company or not, could secure the benefits of the patents on fair and equal terms.

The president of the Chemical Foundation, the Hon. Francis P. Garvan, who succeeded Mr. Palmer as Alien Property Custodian, assures the American people that—

> This foundation proposes to license to any competent, equipped, and patriotic American—individual, firm, or corporation—such of these patents as, with the help and encouragement of the foundation, may be utilized.

My reason for referring to the avowed purposes of the Chemical Foundation is because of the importance to the Nation itself that a corporation so constituted that it is necessarily quasi public in character should be kept ever conscious of its obligations to the public.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. We may differ upon what is actually required to protect and upbuild the dye industry here. There will be differences among us as to the tariff rates required. Many believe that no tariff can be sufficient under all circumstances to protect against Germany's methods, and that there should be coupled with the tariff a further provision that no dyestuffs shall be imported for two years except under a license. The opposition to the licensing board comes from those who fear the autocratic and ofttimes inefficient bureaucratic rule. There is no man in Congress who entertains greater prejudices than I against bureaucratic government. I welcome the day when the boards, bureaus, and other agencies created by Congress during the war will be wiped from the slate, so that American industry may proceed unhampered and unimpeded by red-tape regulations and other unnecessary handicaps. We are justified in establishing such a board only under the most unusual circumstances and for the most imperative reasons.

The subject is too vastly important and interwoven with national interest and security for one to be influenced by prejudice or politics. We should judge the proposition on its merit. What we do here to-day may affect the Nation's destiny. Every dye works is a potential arsenal. No red-blooded American is going to stand by and see our dye industry wiped off the slate by Germany. Our textile manufacturers, who purchase and use the dyes, universally favor an American dye industry, protected and encouraged to produce the entire demands, rather than buy German dyes now at less than cost, and a few months later, when the budding plants of our country have been crushed by ruthless competition, find themselves paying whatever exorbitant prices the Germans might demand. Of course, manufacturers dislike being obliged in exceptional cases to apply for an import license, but if this is necessary to preserve the dye industry, as good Americans they should gladly submit to some inconvenience for two years, and most of them are willing to, in order that a wise national policy may be firmly established.

Will the tariff suffice? When Congress legislated in 1916 upon this subject it did so after exhaustive hearings, and supposed it had provided sufficient protection. Every man in Congress knows now that the present law enacted in September, 1916, is leaky as a sieve. The Germans knew it when Congress passed it. Von Bernstorff transmitted to Berlin in January, 1917, a detailed report, definitely advising how Germany could overcome the barrier. Excerpts from this report read:

> The manufacture of the derivatives offers much greater difficulties for an industry still in the process of development for the reason that such an incredibly large variety of products is necessary. In a well-developed industry like that of the German a technical use is found in the end for all these products. In a less well-developed industry and in an industry which is only in the process of development, great hindrances stand in the way of the utilization of these derivatives. Many can not be used at all and thus become troublesome waste products.

And again:

> Happily the following dyes are excluded from this specific duty: "Except natural and synthetic alizarin and dyes obtained from alizarin, anthracene, and carbazol, natural and synthetic indigo and all indigoids, whether or not obtained from indigo, and medicinals, and flavors." This exception may well become the sheet anchor of the German industry.

And—

> The history of American tariff legislation has shown that, in general, a protective tariff of 30 per cent ad valorem does not afford sufficient protection to create an American industry.

Von Bernstorff also said it should be "as easy as child's play" to defeat the plain intention of the American Government to upbuild its dye industry. Congress thought in 1916 that the increased tariff rates would protect against Germany's methods, but Germany smiled in contempt at our efforts. Now, it is proproposed by the minority of the committee that, after this experience and with an awakened realization of the national necessity, we shall take our chances during this critical period, depending alone upon a higher tariff rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I ask the indulgence of the committee to proceed for about three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I thank the committee.

Germany's policy for 40 years has been to discourage chemical industry in the other nations of the world. Her unscrupulous methods are without parallel in the world's commercial history. In 1910, when aniline oil was selling at 11½ cents, a group of American chemists organized to manufacture this commodity. Germans then sold aniline oil in the United States at 8½ cents, and arbitrarily offered to better any price that might be made by the American producers.

In 1913 five concerns in this country entered upon the manufacture of salicylic acid. The price in Germany was 26½ cents per pound, but during this period she imported to America, paying a specific duty of 5 cents per pound, freight and other charges, and sold in America at 25 cents per pound. Three of the five American manufacturers failed. It was afterwards learned that one of the surviving concerns was a mere branch of a German syndicate.

In 1901 oxalic acid sold at 6 cents per pound. There were no American manufacturers. In 1903 an American engaged in the manufacture of this commodity and the price immediately dropped to 4.7 cents, where it remained until 1907, when the American factory closed its doors. The price instantly raised to 9 cents per pound. Then the American factory reopened, and again the Germans dropped the price, and the American failed.

No bicarbonate of potash was manufactured in America prior to 1901. The prevailing price was 6½ cents. Germany lowered its import value to 2.2 cents and increased her importations from 45,000 pounds to 310,000 pounds annually, and the American manufacturers failed, and the price was immediately raised to 7½ cents and remained there until the war.

When I realize the unscrupulous methods employed by Germany, the utter disregard for principle and fair dealing that has characterized her transactions in the past; that her immense plants are unharmed by war and, on the contrary, greatly expanded; her warehouses crowded to the roofs with surplus dyes accumulated since 1914, barred from England, France, and Japan; the rate of exchange so great as to make it almost imperactive to dump her goods upon American markets—under all these circumstances, for one I am unwilling to vote for the admission of German dyes during the next two years except under license.

We may need that added protection for the next two years. England, France, and Japan, realizing that a dye industry is essential for modern preparedness, have each provided against the importation of dyes except under a license. Are we going to do less for our country? We will vote millions—yes, billions—for armies and navies; yet without high explosives, poisonous gases, and a skilled personnel who understands their manufacture, the armies and navies are powerless. This is a sane, effective preparedness measure. It is economical and American. It proposes to dot this country with great research laboratories where chemists will, for the relief of suffering humanity, delve deep into the mysteries of science and bring forth invaluable remedies from the field of organic chemistry. Great industries, with countless employees, will produce beautiful dyes of a thousand different shades, pharmaceuticals rich in their medicinal properties, and synthetic perfumes rivaling in their fragrance the sweetest rose. It is a picture typical of the peaceful liberty-loving American people. They seek no quarrel, but, aroused by an aggressor, should be prepared to make their adversaries beware. We are passing on a momentous proposition. During this period of uncertainty, the crisis through which the dye industry must now pass, I shall favor both the increased tariff rates and the licensing feature.

We had better be safe than sorry. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE] has made a good speech, but if what he asks should be adopted it would mean complete prohibition, a tariff wall around the country that would make American manufacturers entirely dependent upon the products of those two concerns to which I have referred and such others as might be able to survive here. He would have the mills which need dyestuffs go out of business in order to prepare for the next war, and this while we are endeavoring to prepare for peace and for the successful operation of the industries of the United States. The gentleman from Michigan opened his speech by indorsing the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) had absolutely nothing to do with this bill. Now, I am going to correct the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Nothing to do with the merits presented in the bill. I do not know anything about the preparation of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman the other way.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. No; I spoke in regard to the merits. As to the preparation of the bill, I know nothing about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In order to correct the statement as I understood it, and I accept the gentleman's statement, of course, I am going to read a brief extract from the statement of Judge J. Harry Covington, who was the first witness who appeared before the committee, and who appeared there in company with Mr. Joseph H. Choate, jr., of New York, the general counsel of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.).

These were the gentlemen who asked for these hearings; these were the gentlemen who were the chief witnesses all through the hearings, with the exception of Mr. Garvan, the Alien Property Custodian, for whom they also spoke and who spoke for himself. And in opening up the reason for these hearings Mr. Covington, speaking of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), said:

> Mr. Joseph H. Choate, of New York, and myself are the counsel for that organization as well as for the American Dyes Institute, and, with some appreciation of the time this committee has to take with hearings and the realization it must act with rapidity, we have taken the liberty of putting together in what we believe is the most logical form the story as it will be related by various witnesses.

They—the counsel for the Chemical Foundation (Inc.)—prepared the witnesses to come before the committee.

And he said:

> It is not a thing that needs legal argument; it is not a matter that I should occupy the time of this committee by presenting to you by experts; it is a story that can be unfolded in such a way as to demonstrate to you the necessity, at all hazards, of fully establishing this industry, no matter how severe the conditions may be.

Then Mr. Covington said, in conclusion:

> With that simple statement, I am going to ask you to call these gentlemen in the order in which I have listed their names, because they have the facts and the arguments which you need. I am going to ask each of you to take a copy of the very informing brief prepared by Mr. Joseph H. Choate, who is chief counsel of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), and to have it with you during the progress of this hearing.

I want the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to read this, because he challenged me to find something in the hearings in the interest of the Chemical Foundation (Inc.); and I want my friend from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE] to read this, because it is clear that these hearings were brought about in the interest of the corporation and their counsel.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Will the gentleman pardon a suggestion?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. The proposition I advanced, I will say to the gentleman in all fairness, was that it was absolutely immaterial to the issues presented in this bill to show how this Chemical Foundation was organized and who constitutes it. I care nothing about that in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman opened up by indorsing absolutely the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) had positively nothing to do with this bill. I have produced the evidence showing that that was the institution that asked for the hearings and brought the witnesses.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask that all debate close on this paragraph.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reserving the right to object, I have two more technical amendments to offer, but which I do not think will need any explanation.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not rise now?

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. FORDNEY. I will make it 11 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I do not think we ought to thrash out debate about the Chemical Foundation here for 11 minutes more. It has been discussed all the afternoon, no matter to what paragraph the amendment was pending. It seems to me if that is at all connected with the following paragraphs of the bill the debate upon the Chemical Foundation ought to be reserved until those paragraphs are reached.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have asked the gentlemen to confine the debate to the subject matter of the particular paragraph up for discussion.

Mr. WALSH. That has not been done in the last hour and a half.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to do it now.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent that——

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell me how much of the bill then will be read after the 11 minutes are consumed?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would like to have the balance of this section read. If not, I will ask the committee to rise at the end of this debate and after the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has offered his amendments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman will want to make some argument?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania be willing to reserve that until to-morrow?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. FORDNEY. At the end of this discussion on this paragraph I am going to ask the committee to rise.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. KNUTSON. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is, Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is mistaken. "The gentleman from North Carolina" never said that the Chemical Foundation or its officers did not appear before the Committee on Ways and Means as witnesses, or that their attorneys did not appear before the Committee on Ways and Means as witnesses. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made an attack upon these gentlemen upon the floor of the House, and they did come before the committee, and they came at Mr. MOORE's suggestion, because he wanted to examine them. That is why and how we got their testimony before the House. It was because Mr. MOORE wanted them to come, in order that he could cross-examine them, to unearth something dark and mysterious about them. That is the reason why two-thirds of this volume is filled with their testimony.

The Chemical Foundation, as I said, and as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CURRIE] said, has nothing to do with this bill. The bill is before you on its merits—or demerits, as I think. You are not trying the foundation. If the Chemical Foundation was not in existence you would be called upon to vote upon this bill. Such a bill would have been reported out by the committee—by the Republicans of the committee. The Chemical Foundation may indorse some of the provisions of this bill. It may, like many others, indorse the entire bill. But this is not the bill that the Chemical Foundation was heard upon. That bill has been changed, and changed very materially, not only in the licensing system but in the rates. We had perhaps a dozen or more witnesses before us favoring a high tariff rate and a license provision who had no connection with the Chemical Foundation.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the Chemical Foundation had nothing to do with the preparation of this bill, how is it that the representatives of the Chemical Foundation took up two days of the three days' hearings?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] wanted to investigate it and its officers and kept them before the committee for two days or more.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Choate took up four days and a half of the committee's time presenting something and saying nothing. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me put this up to the quiet common sense of the House: Here is the distinguished chairman of this committee who reports out this bill. Does he intend by his very earnest and enthusiastic remarks to leave the impression that the Chemical Foundation or Mr. Choate, its attorney, made him, as chairman, report out this bill? If the Chemical Foundation had anything to do with this bill, if it wrote this bill or conceived this bill or in any way authored it, why, if the Chemical Foundation or its officers or its attorney were not fair and candid and patriotic, did the distinguished chairman of this committee vote for it in the committee and report it out?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman that I have not said that there was anything wrong with the Chemical Foundation.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman asked me the question, almost with indignation. He thought he had proven Mr. MOORE's case against the foundation by shouting out that its attorney, Mr. Choate, took up four days and a half with the committee.

Mr. FORDNEY. Have I said anything wrong about the Chemical Foundation?

Mr. KITCHIN. You did not.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not true that all the Republicans and part of the Democrats voted to report out this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Democrats voted against the bill solidly. The gentleman from Michigan is correct when he says that he has not said anything wrong about the Chemical Foundation or its officers. He has not, because he could not do it. There is not a scintilla of evidence upon which either he or any member of the committee or of the House can make any charges of the slightest improper conduct on the part of the foundation or its officers or its attorney, Mr. Choate. I have challenged, and do now challenge, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] or any gentleman in the House to point to one line or one word of the evidence in all these hundreds of pages of testimony that would justify him or anyone to impute to the foundation, its officers, or its attorney one improper act or one improper word in connection with the organization of the Chemical Foundation, the sale of the German patents to it, or any of its operations.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WALSH). The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will get in on the next one.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I am very deeply interested in the success of this bill, because I believe it will do a great deal for the development of the industries of this country and for our commercial prosperity. We all know that the dye industry was the darling industry of Germany; that it was supported by the Government. A great deal has been said about controlling the dye market of the world, and a great deal has been said about its importance in connection with national defense. But there is another side to this question, a side which, in my opinion, is more important than the question of national defense or the question of controlling the dye market. Germany gained advantage in a great many lines of industry through the development of the dye industry. It was the industrial processes which were developed in the laboratories of the dye industry that gave Germany a great advantage in probably a hundred different industries, and before this war Germany was rapidly gaining the supremacy of the world in many lines of endeavor. If you will run them down, you will find that most of that success will go right back to the development of the dye industry in that country. Now, we want to develop the dye industry in our own country, not only for the purpose of manufacturing our own dyes, and not only for the purpose of being prepared for national defense in case of war, so that we will have a sufficient quantity of picric acid and all of these other elements which are essential in the manufacture of high explosives, but we also want the advantage of developing in our own laboratories these industrial processes, which will give us the advantage in doing business in the markets of the world, instead of keeping us under a handicap when we compete with nations that have this advantage over us. Now, I firmly believe that we will not give adequate protection under tariff rates, and everybody knows that antidumping provisions are not effective.

I do not like the idea of a licensing system any better than anybody else does, but it is the only system which has been suggested which will meet this situation, and I do not think there are any such grave dangers to be apprehended from it as have been suggested by the people who are opposing this bill.

Now, the licensing commission created by this bill has not an absolute discretion. Its discretion is limited by the terms of the act itself. The act says that they must issue licenses permitting the importation of all dyes that are not produced in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. And what else? The gentleman does not state it all.

Mr. HUSTED. So far as dyes that are not produced in this country are concerned, they must give a license, provided only that they shall not ask for more than their reasonable needs. That is the language of the act.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to read the language?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes; I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. It says—

SEC. 503 (c). The said dye-licensing commission shall issue licenses to import for use in domestic manufacture such of the products covered by section 503 (a) of this act, and such products only, as may be unobtainable from domestic sources on reasonable terms as to price, quality, and delivery.

Who decides as to the reasonable price, quality, and delivery? The commission decides that, and there is no appeal from their decision.

Mr. HUSTED. I will say to the gentleman that that question would not arise at all if the dyes were wholly unobtainable in this country. That question would arise only where the dyes were obtainable in this country, but unobtainable at a fair price. It would not arise at all where the dyes were wholly unobtainable; and where the dyes were wholly unobtainable this commission could be mandamused and compelled to issue a license to allow the importation of those dyes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree entirely with the gentleman [Mr. HUSTED] in his interpretation of this provision, but if there is any conceivable doubt about it, I will say to the gentleman that I have prepared an amendment which absolutely and without any question makes it ironclad that the license must issue where the dyes are unobtainable in this country.

Mr. HUSTED. Now, just one word as to the constituency of this licensing commission. This licensing commission is composed of 10 men, of whom only 3 will represent dye makers. All of the other men represent the consumers of dyes, so that the argument that the consumers of dyes will suffer if this license provision is put in operation is perfect nonsense, because the consumers of dyes are in a majority and in a position to protect their own interests. I think we can safely rely upon the brains and common sense and business acumen of American business men to protect their own interests when they are in a majority and have the decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I am confident that the method of designating the commission provided in section 503 (b) is without constitutional warrant, and I ask unanimous consent to print at this point in the RECORD some amendments to section 503 which I intend to offer when that section is reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this time and place some amendments that he desires to offer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments are as follows:

Amendments proposed by Mr. ANDERSON to H. R. 8078:

Page 9, line 3, strike out all of section 503 (a) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The President is authorized and directed to appoint a dye-licensing commissioner, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall have the duties and exercise the powers and functions prescribed in section 503 (c) of this act, and who shall hold office for a period of two years after the date of the approval of this act unless sooner removed by order of the President."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I offer two technical amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 7, line 12, before the word "if" insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 17, after the word "adopt," strike out "standards of strength" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "a standard of strength for each dye or other product."

In line 18, strike out "strength used" and insert "strength in ordinary use."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8078 and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending railroad legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 26, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, September 26, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast given to us a world in which fitness of character is fitness for life. In all the performance of duty we turn to Thee, the author of all goodness. The law of life has come from Thee. We pray Thee to so incline our hearts that we may keep Thy law and glorify Thy name in our lives. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. NELSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 641) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina conferees on the part of the Senate.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—PEACE TREATY.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to make a short statement.

A day or two ago I voted against the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to postpone for a week the consideration of a certain amendment to the peace treaty. That vote seems to have caused more excitement in my State than the visit of the President. At any rate, I have received many more telegrams in reference to it than I have in reference to the effect of his visit. Some of my friends seem to think that I have gone back on America. Others seem to think that I have announced my defiance to the league of nations. I was entirely innocent of any intention to indicate my position on the amendment or the covenant.

I want to say that that vote had absolutely no significance whatever except that I am in favor of proceeding with the consideration of the amendments and the covenant just as promptly and rapidly as possible. I know what I am going to do with reference to them, and I expect to state my position on the treaty some time next week. I thought I made it pretty clear when I was in the State a short time ago. I understand that some Senators have been just a little worried about my position because of that vote. I thought this statement might ease their minds also.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MOSES. I present resolutions on the league of nations adopted by the American Legion, of Westchester, N. Y., which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Action by American Legion, of Westchester, on the league of nations. Charles H. Duell, jr., chairman of convention.]

COURTHOUSE,
White Plains, N. Y., September 25, 1919.

Whereas the American Legion has been created primarily to safeguard Americanism, liberty, our national sovereignty, and the best traditions of American life, and in joining the same we did so to uphold these very things if need be against the world; and

Whereas to-day we believe there is great danger that these principles may be sacrificed, destroyed in fact, as effectively as if the independence which the thirteen Colonies fought for had been lost or never fought for, and in any event, if this danger is not averted, the United States will have lost its leadership and independence in world affairs, and we will to that extent become again a "colony" of another nation that after 143 years has become the "real victor"; and

Whereas this danger which confronts the Nation is the present attempt to force adoption by the United States of America of a league of nations which does not, as it now stands, adequately safeguard our national life as a people, free and independent: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By the American Legion, of Westchester, in convention assembled, that we protest most vigorously against this attempt on the part of certain elements in our own country to undermine the American character and to foist upon the Nation a wicked idealism which banishes all the practical safeguards for the country's future that have hitherto stood the test of time and is contrary to the purpose of liberty for which America entered the war and for which we veterans of the war offered our life's blood and sacrificed to maintain: And so be it further

Resolved, The American Legion, realizing that the league of nations is by no means a party or political issue, but rather a national calamity and disaster if adopted as at present drawn, that we therefore stand opposed to any league of nations which does not adequately protect:

(1) The Monroe doctrine, which America alone shall interpret.

(2) Our domestic affairs from foreign interference or domination.

(3) Our right of withdrawal from the league, the United States to be the sole judge of whether or not her international obligations have been fulfilled.

(4) That any action by the United States under so-called "Article 10" shall be had only as Congress shall determine.

(5) That the vote of the United States in the league of nations shall at all times be equal to the vote of the British Empire; and toward that end we heartily indorse the red-blooded attitude of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate in favorably reporting such reservations and amendment as above outlined, and we commend those Senators who on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere are making the fight to preserve American Independence.

And in view of the fact that this action taken by the veterans of Westchester, one of the great counties of the State of New York, is typical in their opinion of the same feeling existent among their fellow veterans everywhere with whom they fought side by side, and with whom they have learned to think alike and stand as one man when the Nation is in danger, it is hereby ordered that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, to every United States Senator, and to the President of the United States, in the hope that the deep and earnest convictions of men who fought their country's fight may help to avert disaster.

CHARLES H. DUELL, Jr.,
Chairman of Convention.

Mr. MOSES presented a memorial of the Polish-American Society of Manchester, N. H., remonstrating against German atrocities now being committed in Silesia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Polish-American Society of Manchester, N. H., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS. I present a memorial of the George T. Davies Post, of the American Legion of Concordia, Kans., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCORDIA, KANS., September 22, 1919.

MY DEAR SIR: The following is a true copy of a resolution introduced and passed by the George T. Davies Post, of the American Legion.

Respectfully,

DANIEL C. IMBODEN, Post Commander.
LESTER B. SHROUF, Post Adjutant.

"Whereas the George T. Davies Post, of the American Legion, Concordia, Kans., believing that the United States is a great, glorious, and wonderful country and fit to live in and believing further that if the United States is fit to live in that it is a country fit to fight for, hereby

"Resolved, That the action of Secretary of War Newton D. Baker in discharging the conscientious objectors serving prison sentences is condemned as unpatriotic and unworthy of a Secretary of War; that the action of Secretary of War Newton D. Baker in discharging the conscientious objectors serving prison sentences is a complete surrender of law and order to anarchy; that the action of Secretary of War Newton D. Baker in discharging conscientious objectors serving prison sentences is a menace to the future of the United States; that the action of Secretary of War Newton D. Baker in discharging the conscientious objectors serving prison sentences is an insult to the large body of patriotic American soldiers who gave or were ready to give their lives for the traditions of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved by the George T. Davies Post, of the American Legion, That the post requests the Congress of the United States to investigate and report to the people of the United States the reason why Secretary of War Newton D. Baker discharged the conscientious objectors serving prison sentences; that the post send copies of these resolutions to the United States Senators from Kansas and to the Congressmen from Kansas requesting their cooperation in seeing that the public, and especially the ex-service men of the United States, are informed why the conscientious objectors serving prison sentences were discharged; and be it further

"Resolved by the George T. Davies Post, of the American Legion, That the Congress of the United States be requested to pass laws deporting from the limits of the United States the conscientious objectors serving prison sentences subsequently discharged by Secretary of War Newton D. Baker; and be it further

"Resolved by the George T. Davies Post, of the American Legion, Concordia, Kans., That there is only one principle upon which true Americanism can stand, and that is the United States being a country fit to live in is a country fit to fight for."

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 1028, International Association of Machinists, of Newton, Kans., praying for the adoption of the so-called Plumb plan for the operation and control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of Local Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Wethersfield, Conn., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 11, Lithuanian National League of America, of Waterbury, Conn., praying for the recognition by the United States of the independence of Lithuania, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 71, International Molders' Union of North America, of Ansonia, Conn., and a petition of Local Union No. 282, Cigar Makers' International Union, of Bridgeport, Conn., praying that the State Department request that Great Britain extend to Americans in England the same protection to their person and property that is demanded of Russia and Mexico, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Thomas Francis Meagher Branch of the Friends of Irish Freedom, of Bridgeport, Conn., and a petition of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and Ladies' Auxiliary, of Danbury, Conn., praying that the United States refuse to grant loans of money to Great Britain until such time as the army of occupation is removed from Ireland and the Irish government be allowed to function in accordance with the expressed will of the Irish people, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of Major McBride Branch, Friends of Irish Freedom, of Stockton, Calif., remonstrating against the deportation of certain Hindus, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 88) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes," reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, other recognizd educational institutions, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 221) thereon.

CAMP A. A. HUMPHREYS, VA.

Mr. WADSWORTH. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 208) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., and I wish to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. NELSON. I object to its present consideration. I have been at Camp Humphreys and I have seen enough of it. The idea of squandering more money on that camp is outrageous.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, I can not overcome the objection of the Senator from Minnesota, but this has nothing to do with the squandering of money at Camp Humphreys.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection——

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Minnesota objected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Minnesota did object.

Mr. NELSON. I objected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps the Senator from Minnesota will withdraw his objection. I assure him that this has nothing to do with the squandering of money.

Mr. NELSON. I do not want any measure to pass that allows the Secretary of War to transfer certain funds to Camp Humphreys. I want the Senator to go down and look at that camp. I wish the whole Senate would go down and look at it, and they would not vote to sink another dollar there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have been there; but, of course, that does not cause the Senator to withdraw his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

DIGEST OF BUDGET LEGISLATION (S. DOC. NO. 111).

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 193), and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

INLAND TRANSPORTATION BY WATER.

Mr. RANSDELL. I offer an amendment relative to inland transportation by water, intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 2906) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, which I ask to have printed and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

AMENDMENT OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE ACT.

Mr. HARDING submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

JAPANESE AND CHINESE RELATIONS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Washington will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 196), as follows:

Resolved, That the President is requested, if not incompatible with public interest, to transmit to the Senate, confidentially if required, the copy of the cable dispatch from the ambassador of the United States to China addressed to the President in January, 1919, in which the ambassador discussed fully and confidentially the Japanese-Chinese relations, which dispatch was forwarded to the President through the State Department about January 6, 1919.

The President is also requested, if not incompatible with public interest, to cause to be transmitted to the Senate, confidentially if required, copies of the dispatches of the military attachés of the United States at Tokyo and Peking addressed to the Chief of the Bureau of Military Intelligence, War Department, in and about the month of January, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington for present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I ask that it be so referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

U. S. S. "HENDERSON."

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 194), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to inform the Senate whether the U. S. S. Henderson, Capt. W. R. Sayles, United States Navy, which sailed on the 12th of September, is being sent to Europe in connection with the work of carrying out that section of the treaty with Germany which provides for a plebiscite of the people of Schleswig-Holstein, and whether the Henderson carries marines to be employed in any way in connection with that plebiscite.

ACTIVITIES OF AMERICAN MARINES IN DALMATIA.

Mr. KNOX submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 195), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform the Senate whether American marines were landed from a torpedo-boat destroyer or any other naval vessel to compel the Italians to evacuate Trau, Dalmatia, as reported in the following dispatch by the Associated Press published in the Washington Post of September 26, 1919:

"COPENHAGEN, September 25.

"American marines landed from a torpedo-boat destroyer to compel the Italians to evacuate Trau, Dalmatia, according to a dispatch received here from Spalato, a short distance east of Trau.

"The Italians left after the inhabitants fired on them. Jugo-Slav troops took over the town from the Americans.

"The dispatch, which is dated September 25, says that a Jugo-Slav detachment began an advance toward Trau when the American destroyer entered the harbor to compel the retirement of the Italians.

"The inhabitants of Trau then opened fire on the Italians, who hastily departed.

"200 AMERICANS LAND.

"The Italian commander and three men in an armored car fell into the hands of the Slavs. In the meantime 200 American marines, with machine guns, landed and took over the armored car and the prisoners, who subsequently were transferred to an Italian ship.

"Then the Serbians arrived and were enthusiastically welcomed. The Americans handed over the town to the Jugo-Slav troops and reembarked. The destroyer will remain in the harbor for a few days.

LABOR STRIKES.

Mr. THOMAS. I submitted two or three days ago Senate resolution 190, which went over under the rule and has not been disposed of. I ask that it be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Whereas the right of citizens to organize for the promotion of their views and the improvement of their condition, and to utilize all means to the attainment of their ends, which are consonant with law, justice, and the limitations of the Constitution; and

Whereas this right, long exercised and enjoyed for some time past, has been and is being utilized oppressively, unjustly, and for the accomplishment of aims and objects wholly repugnant to free institutions and to the inalienable rights of the citizen, thus promoting riot, restraining trade and commerce, overthrowing law and destroying order, and imperiling the lives and limbs of the people of States and communities: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we view with deep concern and disapproval all combinations, conspiracies, and disturbances designed to accomplish objects lawfu or unlawful by frauds, force, disorder, or resort to other criminal methods.

That in America every citizen in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, has the constitutional right to follow any calling or to refrain therefrom as he may choose. That this right is mutual and universal, any denial of or interference with which is wholly contrary to free institutions and individual liberty.

That the so-called closed shop, the denial to the citizen of the right to a livelihood for the support of himself and family free from limitations imposed upon him outside the law are tyrannous, un-American, and wholly in conflict with the fundamentals of American freedom.

That so-called strikes for power, paralyzing business, interfering with distribution, lowering production, defying the laws, and necessarily resulting in riot, insurrection, murder, and the destruction of property, are conspiracies in restraint of trade and should be prevented whenever possible and resisted at all times.

That no person, association, or corporation can be safely or constitutionally exempted or excluded from the obligations, penalties, and prohibitions of general laws enacted for the public safety and welfare.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—HARLIN L. CLARK.

On motion of Mr. BECKHAM, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill, S. 1509, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, granting increase of pension to Harlin L. Clark, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of a letter forwarded to me from New Jersey demonstrating a State-wide propaganda among the people of that State in favor of the covenant of the league of nations as presented, and demonstrating that the ministers of the State are being called upon to hold special Sunday services for that purpose. It is in the form of a letter, and in order to make it public I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE.
TRENTON, N. J.

Rev. ROBERT C. JENKINS,
Camden, N. J.:

We are endeavoring to put on record immediately the sentiment of the leading people of the State in regard to the league of nations. A campaign has been started to that end and you are asked to enroll at once.

Our plan is to have every individual and organization possible wire or write our Senators, hence we desire wide distribution of the inclosed slip, also to reach ready-made meetings by means of speakers sent from our speakers' bureau under the direction of Mr. William J. Tighe, West Hoboken, N. J.

Will you not set aside a Sunday service for the favorable presentation of this vital question?

Encouraging letters are coming in daily from the thinking men and women of the State, and now is the crucial moment. Will you not advise us of the course you have taken?

Cordially, yours,

HENRY VAN DYKE.

Kindly reply to Miss MacIlvaine, 154 West State Street, Trenton, N. J.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World indorsing the league of nations and asking for the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany. This association, composed of men very close to the business interests of the world, recently held its convention in New Orleans.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"The Associated Advertising Clubs of the World notified the league to-day that the following resolution calling for ratification of the peace treaty and the covenant 'at the earliest possible moment without amendments or reservations involving the renegotiation of the treaty with Germany' had been adoped at their convention in New Orleans:

"'The Advertising Clubs of the World pause at the threshold of this their victory convention to express their gratification that the United States Senate is giving uninterrupted consideration to the one matter upon which hangs the settlement of gravest business and industrial problems and the assuagement of the agonies of the whole world.

"'Pledged in the printed word, as it helped to rally the patriotic man power and monetary strength of the Nation in a war against wars, this body feels impelled by good faith, as well as by its desire to hold to the high vision that made America invincible, to reaffirm its unanimous advocacy of the peace of Versailles and the league of nations at the earliest possible moment, without amendment or reservations involving the renegotiation of the treaty with Germany.

"'To hold companionship with truth with which it has linked the business ideals of two hemispheres, the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World would speedily evoke peace, covenanted peace, so that the economic world, now divided and discordant, may catch the inspiration of the wiser way of composing its differences, and that this Republic may garner the full fruitage of its wartime unity, heroisms, and sacrifices.'

"This resolution was introduced by James Schermerhorn, editor of the Detroit Times, and adopted unanimously."

SPEECHES BY PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD the authentic copies of the speeches delivered by the President of the United States September 9, 10, and 11.

There being no objection, the speeches of the President were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT AT MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., SEPTEMBER 9, 1919.

"Your honor, your excellency, my fellow countrymen, I have come here to discuss a very solemn question, and I shall have to ask your patience while you bear with me in discussing somewhat in detail the very great matter which now lies not only before the consideration of the people of the United States but before the consideration of the people of the world. You have heard so many little things about the treaty that perhaps you would like to hear some big things about it. To hear some gentlemen you would think it was an arrangement for the inconvenience of the United States, whereas, as a matter of fact, my fellow citizens, it is a world settlement, the first ever attempted, attempted upon broad lines which were first laid down in America. For, my fellow citizens, what does not seem to me realized in this blessed country of ours is the fact that the world is in revolution. I do not mean in active revolution. I do not mean that it is in a state of mind which will bring about the dissolution of governments. I mean that it is in a state of mind which may bring about the dissolution of governments if we do not enter into a world settlement which will really in fact and in power establish justice and right.

"The old order of things the rest of the world seemed to have got in some sense used to. The old order of things was not to depend upon the general moral judgment of mankind, not to base policies upon international right, but to base policies upon international power. So there were drawn together groups of nations which stood armed, facing one another, which stood drawing their power from the vitality of people who did not wish to be subordinated to them, drawing their vitality from the energy of great peoples who did not wish to devote their energy to force, but wished to devote their energy to peace. The world thought it is was inevitable. This group of nations thought that it represented one set of principles; that group of nations thought that it represented another set of principles and that the best that could be accomplished in the world was this that they used to call the balance of power.

"Notice the phrase. Not the balance that you try to maintain in a court of justice, not the scales of justice, but the scales of force; one great force balanced against another force. Every bit of the policy of the world, internationally speaking, was made in the interest of some national advantage on the part of the stronger nations of the world. It was either the advantage of Germany or the advantage of Great Britain or the advantage of Italy or the advantage of Japan. I am glad to say that I am not justified in adding that the policy of the world was ever conceived by us upon the basis of the advantage of America. We wished always to be the mediators of justice and of right, but we thought that the cool spaces of the ocean to the east and the west of us would keep us from the infections that came, arising like miasmatic mists out of that arrangement of power and of suspicion and of dread.

"I believe, my fellow countrymen, that the only people in Europe who instinctively realized what was going to happen and what did happen in 1914 was the French people. It has been my privilege to come into somewhat intimate contact with that interesting and delightful people, and I realize now that for nearly 50 years, ever since the settlement which took Alsace-Lorraine away from them in 1871, they have been living under the constant dread of the catastrophe which at last came; and their thought throughout this conference was that they must concert some measure, must draw together some kind of cooperative force, which would take this intolerable dread from their hearts, that they could not live another 50 years, expecting what would come at last. But the other nations took it lightly. There were wise men in Great Britain, there were wise men in the United States, who pointed out to us not only what they suspected, but what we all knew with regard to the preparations for the use of force in Europe. Nobody was ignorant of what Germany was doing. What we shut our eyes against deliberately was the probability that she would make the use of her preparation that she did finally make of it. Her military men published books and told us what they were going to do with it, but we dismissed them. We said, 'The thing is a nightmare. The man is a crank. It can not be that he speaks for a great Government. The thing is inconceivable and can not happen.' Very well, could not it happen? Did not it happen? Are we satisfied now what the balance of power means? It means that the stronger force will sometimes be exercised or an attempt be made to exercise it to crush the other powers.

"The great nations of the world have been asleep, but God knows the other nations have not been asleep. I have seen representatives of peoples over there who for generations through, in the dumbness of unutterable suffering, have known what the weight of those armaments and the weight of that power meant. The great Slavic people, the great Roumanian people, the people who were constantly under the pressure of that power, the great Polish people—they all knew, but they were inarticulate; there was no place in the world where they dared speak out. Now the catastrophe has come. Blood has been spilt in rivers, the flower of the European nations has been destroyed, and at last the voiceless multitudes of men are awake, and they have made up their minds that rather than have this happen again, if the governments can not get together, they will destroy the governments.

"I am not speaking revolution, my friends. I believe that the most disastrous thing that can happen to the underman, to the man who is suffering, to the man who has not had his rights, is to destroy public order, for that makes it certain he never can get his rights. I am far from intimating that, but I am intimating this, that the people of the world are tired of every other kind of experiment except the one we are going to try. I have called it an experiment; I frankly admit that it is an experiment, but it is a very promising experiment, because there is not a statesman in the world who does not know that his people demand it. He is not going to change his mind. He is not going to change his direction. He is not speaking what he wants, it may be, but he is speaking what he knows he must speak, and that there is no turning back; that the world has turned a corner that it will never turn again. The old order is gone, and nobody can build it up again.

"In the meantime what are men doing? I want you to reflect upon this, my fellow countrymen, because this is not a speech-making occasion; this is a conference. I want you men to reflect upon what I am about to call your attention to. The object of the war was to destroy autocratic power; that is to say, to make it impossible that there should be anywhere, as there was on Wilhelmstrasse, in Berlin, a little group of military men who could brush aside the bankers, brush aside the merchants, brush aside the manufacturers, brush aside the Emperor himself, and say, "We have perfected a machine with which we can conquer the world; now stand out of the way, we are going to conquer the world." There must not be that possibility any more. There must not be men anywhere in any private place who can plot the mastery of civilization. But in the meantime look at the pitiful things that are happening. There is not a day goes by, my fellow citizens, that my heart is not heavy to think of our fellow beings in that great, pitiful kingdom of Russia, without form, without order, without government. Look what they have done. They have permitted a little handful of men—I am told there are only 34 of them constituting the real Bolshevist government—to set up a minority government just as autocratic and just as cruelly unmerciful as the Government of the Czar ever was. The danger to the world, my fellow citizens, against which we must absolutely lock the door in this country, is that some governments of minorities may be set up here as elsewhere. We will brook the control of no minority in the United States. For my own part, I would as leave live under one autocracy as another; I would as leave obey one group as another; I would as leave be the servant of one minority as another, but I do not intend to be the servant of any minority. As I have told you, the mass of men are awake. They are not going to let the world sink back into that old slough of misused authority again.

"Very well, then, what are we discussing? What are we debating in the United States? Whether we will take part in guiding and steadying the world or not. And some men hesitate. It is the only country in the world whose leadership and guidance will be accepted. If we do not give it, we may look forward, my fellow citizens, to something like a generation of doubt and of disorder which it will be impossible to pass through without the wreckage of a very considerable part of our slowly constructed civilization. America and her determinations now constitute the balance of moral force in the world, and if we do not use that moral force we will be of all peoples the most derelict. We are in the presence of this great choice, in the presence of this fundamental choice, whether we will stand by the mass of our own people and the mass of mankind. Pick up the great volume of the treaty. It is a great volume. It is as thick as that [illustrating]. You would think it just had three or four articles in it to hear some men talk about it. It is a thick volume, containing the charter of the new order of the world. I took the pains to write down here some of the things that it provides for, and if you will be patient I will read them, because I can make it more brief that way.

"It provides for the destruction of autocratic power as an instrument of international control, admitting only self-governing nations to the league of nations. Had you ever been told that before? No nation is admitted to the league of nations whose people do not control its government. That is the reason that we are making Germany wait. She says that henceforth her people are going to control her Government, but we have got to wait and see. If they do control it, she is as welcome to the league as anybody else, because we are not holding nations off. We are holding selfish groups of men off. We are not saying to peoples, 'We do not want to be your comrades and serve you along with the rest of our fellow beings,' but we are saying, 'It depends upon your attitude; if you take charge of your own affairs, then come into the game and welcome.' The league of nations sends autocratic governments to coventry. That is the first point.

"It provides for the substitution of publicity, discussion and arbitration for war. That is the supreme thing that it does. I will not go into details now, but every member of the league promises not to go to war until there has been a discussion and a cooling off of nine months, and, as I have frequently said on this tour, if Germany had submitted to discussion for nine days she never would have dared go to war. Though every foreign office in Europe begged her to do so, she would not grant 24 hours for a meeting of the representatives of the Governments of the world to ask what it was all about, because she did not dare tell what it was all about. Nine months' cooling off is a very valuable institution in the affairs of mankind. And you have got to have a very good case if you are willing that all your fellow men should know the whole case, for that is provided for, and talk about it for nine months. Nothing is more valuable, if you think your friend is a fool, than to induce him to hire a hall. If you think he is a fool the only way to prove it is to let him address a mass of his fellow citizens and see how they like his ideas. If they like them and you do not, it may be that you are the fools! The proof is presented at any rate.

"Instead of using force after this period of discussion, something very much more effective than force is proposed, namely, an absolute boycott of the nation that does not keep its covenant, and when I say an absolute boycott I mean an absolute boycott. There can not be any kind of intercourse with that nation. It can not sell or buy goods. It can not receive or send messages or letters. It can not have any transactions with the citizens of any member of the league, and when you consider that the league is going to consist of every considerable nation in the world, except Germany, you can see what that boycott will mean. There is not a nation in the world, except this one, that can live without importing goods for nine months, and it does not make any difference to us whether we can or not, because we always fulfill our obligations, and there will never be a boycott for us.

"It provides for placing the peace of the world under constant international oversight, in recognition of the principle that the peace of the world is the legitimate and immediate interest of every nation. Why, as it stands at present, my fellow citizens, if there is likely to be trouble between two nations other than the United States it is considered an unfriendly and hostile act for the United States to intervene. This covenant makes it the right of the United States, and not the right of the United States merely, but the right of the weakest nation in the world to bring anything that the most powerful nation in the world is doing that is likely to disturb the peace of the world under the scrutiny of mankind. [Voice in audience, 'And that is right!'] My friend in the audience says that is right, and it undoubtedly is, because the peace of the world is everybody's business. Yet this is the first document that ever recognized that principle. We now have the attitude of the Irishman, you know, who went into one of those antique institutions known as a saloon. It was rather a large place and he saw two men fighting over in the corner. He went up to the bartender and he said, 'Is this a private fight, or can anybody get in?' Now, in the true Irish spirit, we are abolishing private fights, and we are making it the law of mankind that it is everybody's business and everybody can get in. The consequence is that there will be no attempt at private fights.

"It provides for disarmament on the part of the great fighting nations of the world.

"It provides in detail for the rehabilitation of oppressed peoples, and that will remove most of the causes of war.

"It provides that there shall be no more annexations of territory anywhere, but that those territories whose people are not ready to govern themselves shall be instrusted to the trusteeship of the nations that can take care of them, the trustee nation to be responsible in annual report to the league of nations; that is to say, to mankind in general, subject to removal and restricted in respect to anything that might be done to that population which would be to the detriment of the population itself. So that you can not go into darkest Africa and make slaves of those poor people, as some governments at times have done.

"It abolishes enforced labor. It takes the same care of the women and children of those unschooled races that we try to take of the women and children of ours. Why, my fellow citizens, this is the great humane document of all time.

"It provides that every secret treaty shall be invalid. It sweeps the table of all private understandings and enforces the principle that there shall be no private understandings of any kind that anybody is bound to respect. One of the difficulties in framing this treaty was that after we got over there private—secret—treaties were springing up on all sides like a noxious growth. You had to guard your breathing apparatus against the miasma that arose from some of them. But they were treaties, and the war had been fought on the principle of the sacredness of treaties. We could not propose that solemn obligations, however unwisely undertaken, should be disregarded, but we could do the best that was possible in the presence of those understandings and then say, 'No more of this; no more secret understandings.' And the representatives of every great nation in the world assented without demur—without the slightest difficulty.

"I do not think you realize what a change of mind has come over the world. As we used to say in the old days, some men that never got it before have got religion.

"It provides for the protection of dependent peoples.

"It provides that high standards of labor, such as are observed in the United States, shall be extended to the workingman everywhere in the world.

"It provides that all the great humane instrumentalities, like the Red Cross, like the conventions against the opium trade, like the regulation of the liquor traffic with debased and ignorant people, like the prohibition of the selling of arms and ammunition to people who can use them only to their own detriment, shall be under the common direction and control of the league of nations. Now, did you ever hear of all these things before? That is the treaty, my fellow citizens; and I can only conjecture that some of the men who are fighting the treaty either never read it themselves or are taking it for granted that you will not read it. I say without hesitation that no international agreement has ever before been drawn up along those lines—of the universal consideration of right and the interest of humanity.

"Now, it is said that that is all very well, but we need not go in. Well, of course we need not. There is perfect freedom of the will. I am perfectly free to go to the top of this building and jump off, but if I do I will not take very much interest in human affairs. The Nation is at liberty in one sense to do anything it pleases to discredit itself; but this is absolutely as certain as I stand here, that it never will do anything to discredit itself. Our choice in this great enterprise of mankind that I have tried to outline to you is only this: Shall we go in and assist as trusted partners or shall we stay out and act as suspected rivals? We have got to do one or the other. We have got to be either provincials or statesmen. We have got to be either ostriches or eagles. The ostrich act I see being done all around me. I see gentlemen burying their heads in something and thinking that nobody sees that they have submerged their thinking apparatus. That is what I mean by being ostriches. What I mean by being eagles I need not describe to you. I mean leaving the mists that lie close along the ground, getting upon strong wing into those upper spaces of the air where you can see with clear eyes the affairs of mankind, see how the affairs of America are linked with the affairs of men everywhere, see how the whole world turns with outstretched hands to this blessed country of ours and says, 'If you will lead, we will follow.' God helping us, my fellow countrymen, we will lead when they follow. The march is still long and toilsome to those heights upon which there rests nothing but the pure light of the justice of God, but the whole incline of affairs is toward those distant heights; and this great Nation, in serried ranks, millions strong—presently hundreds of millions strong—will march at the fore of the great procession, breasting those heights with its eyes always lifted to the eternal goal!"

THE PRESIDENT AT AUDITORIUM, ST. PAUL, MINN., SEPTEMBER 9, 1919.

"Mr. Chairman, my fellow countrymen, I am very happy that the mayor sounded the note that he has just sounded, because by some sort of devination he realized what was in my heart to-night. I do not feel since I have left Washington this time that I am on an ordinary errand. I do not feel that I am on a political errand, even in the broad sense of that term. I feel rather that I am going about to hold counsel with my fellow countrymen concerning the most honorable and distinguished course which our great country can take at this turning point in the history of the world. And the mayor was quite right when he said that this is a conference concerning the true interpretation of the American spirit. I believe, I hope without an undue touch of national pride, that it is only the American spirit that can be the true mediator of peace.

"The theme that I find uppermost in my thought to-night is this: We are all actuated, my fellow countrymen, by an intense consciousness and love of America. I do not think that it is fancy on my part; it is based upon long experience that in every part of the world I can recognize an American the minute I see him. Yet that is not because we are all of one stock. We are of more varied origins and stocks than any people in the world. We come from all the great races of the world. We are made up out of all the nations and peoples who have stood at the center of civilization. In this part of the country it is doubtful whether in some of our great cities 50 per cent of the people come of parents born in America. One of the somewhat serious jests which I allowed myself to indulge on the other side of the water was with my Italian colleagues when they were claiming the city of Fiume upon the Adriatic because of its Italian population, and other cities scattered here and there whose surrounding population was not Italian but in whom an Italian element played an important part. I said, 'That is not a sufficient argument for the extension of Italian sovereignty to these people, because there are more Italians in New York City than in any city in Italy, and I doubt if you would feel justified in suggesting that the sovereignty of Italy be extended over the city of New York.' I advert to this, my fellow citizens, merely as one illustration, that could be multiplied a hundredfold, of the singular make-up of this great Nation.

"I do not know how it happens that we are all Americans; we are so different in origin; we are so different in memories. The memory of America does not go very far back as measured by the distances of history, and great millions of our people carry in their hearts the traditions of other people, the traditions of races never bred in America; yet we are all unmistakably and even in appearance Americans, and nothing else. There is only one possible explanation for that, my fellow citizens, and that is that there is in the practice and in the tradition of this country a set of principles which, however imperfectly, get into the consciousness of every man who lives in this country.

"One of the chief elements that make an American is this: In almost every other country there is some class that dominates, or some governmental authority that determines the course of politics, or some ancient system of land laws that limits the freedom of land tenure, or some ancient custom which ties a man into a particular groove in the land in which he lives. There is none of that in America. Every man in America, if he behaves himself, knows that he stands on the same footing as every other man in America, and, thank goodness, we are in sight of the time when every woman will know that she stands upon the same footing. We do not have to ask anybody's leave what we shall think or what we shall do or how we shall vote. We do not have to get the approval of a class as to our behavior. We do not have to square ourselves with standards that have been followed ever since our great-grandfathers. We are very much more interested in being great-grandfathers than in having had great-grandfathers, because our view is to the future. America does not march, as so many other peoples march, looking back over its shoulder. It marches with its eyes not only forward, but with its eyes lifted to the distances of history, to the great events which are slowly culminating, in the Providence of God, in the lifting of civilization to new levels and new achievements. That is what makes us Americans.

"And yet I was mistaken a moment ago when I said we are nothing else, because there are a great many hyphens left in America. For my part, I think the most un-American thing in the world is a hyphen. I do not care what it is that comes before the word 'American.' It may be a German-American, or an Italian-American, a Swedish-American, or an Anglo-American, or an Irish-American. It does not make any difference what comes before the 'American,' it ought not to be there, and every man who comes to take counsel with me with a hyphen in his conversation I take no interest in whatever. The entrance examination, to use my own parlance, into my confidence is, 'Where do you put America in your thoughts? Do you put it first, always first, unquestionably first?' Then we can sit down together and talk, but not otherwise. Now, I want you distinctly to understand that I am not quarreling with the affectionate memories of people who have drawn their origin from other countries. I no more blame a man for dwelling with fond affection upon the traditions of some great race not bred in America than I blame a man for remembering with reverence his mother and his father and his forebears that bred him and that gave him a chance in the world. I am not quarreling with those affections; I am talking about purposes. Every purpose is for the future, and the future for Americans must be for America.

"We have got to choose now, my fellow citizens, what kind of future it is going to be for America. I think that what I have said justifies me in adding that this Nation was created to be the mediator of peace, because it draws its blood from every civilized stock in the world and is ready by sympathy and understanding to understand the peoples of the world, their interests, their rights, their hopes, their destiny. America is the only Nation in the world that has that equipment. Every other nation is set in the mold of a particular breeding. We are set in no mold at all. Every other nation has certain prepossessions which run back through all the ramifications of an ancient history. We have nothing of the kind. We know what all peoples are thinking, and yet we by a fine alchemy of our own combine that thinking into an American plan and an American purpose. America is the only Nation which can sympathetically lead the world in organizing peace.

"Constantly, when I was on the other side of the water, delegations representing this, that, and the other peoples of Europe or of Asia came to visit me to solicit the interest of America in their fortunes, and, without exception, they were able to tell me that they had kinsmen in America. Some of them, I am ashamed to say, came from countries I had never heard of before, and yet even they were able to point, not to a handful, not to a few hundreds, but to several thousand kinsmen in America. I never before knew that they came, but they are here and they are our interpreters, the interpreters on our behalf of the interests of the people from whom they sprang. They came to America as sort of advanced couriers of those people. They came in search of the Golden West. They came in search of the liberty that they understood reigned among that free and happy people. They were drawn by the lure of justice, by the lure of freedom, out of lands where they were oppressed, suppressed, where life was made impossible for them upon the free plane that their hearts had conceived. They said, "Yonder is our star in the west," and then the word went home, "We have found the land. They are a free people that are capable of understanding us. You go to their representatives in Paris and put your case before them, and they will understand." What a splendid thing that is, my fellow countrymen! I want you to keep this in your minds as a conception of the question that we are now called upon to decide.

"To hear some men talk about the league of nations you would suppose that it was a trap set for America; you would suppose that it was an arrangement by which we entered into an alliance with other great, powerful nations to make war some time. Why, my fellow countrymen, it bears no resemblance to such description. It is a great method of common counsel with regard to the common interests of mankind. We shall not be drawn into wars; we shall be drawn into consultation, and we will be the most trusted adviser in the whole group. Consultation, discussion, is written all over the whole face of the covenant of the league of nations, for the heart of it is that the nations promise not to go to war until they have consulted, until they have discussed, until all the facts in the controversy have been laid before the court which represents the common opinion of mankind.

"That is the league of nations. Nothing can be discussed there that concerns our domestic affairs. Nothing can be discussed there that concerns the domestic affairs of any other people, unless something is occurring in some nation which is likely to disturb the peace of the world, and any time that any question arises which is likely to disturb the peace of the world, then the covenant makes it the right of any member, strong or weak, big or little, of that universal concert of the nations to bring that matter up for clarification and discussion. Can you imagine anything more calculated to put war off, not only to put it off, but to make it violently improbable? When a man wants to fight he does not go and discuss the matter with the other fellow. He goes and hits him, and then somebody else has to come in and either join the fight or break it up. I used a very homely illustration the other night, which perhaps it may not be amiss for me to use again. I had two friends who were becoming more and more habitually profane. Their friends did not like it. They not only had the fundamental scruple that it was wrong, but they also thought, as I heard a very refined lady say, "It was not only wrong but, what was worse, it was vulgar." They did not like to see their friends adjourning all the rest of their vocabulary and using only those words. So they made them enter into a solemn agreement—I ought to say they lived in a large city—that they would not swear inside the corporate limits, that if they got in a state of mind which made it necessary to explode in profanity they would get out of town and swear.

"The first time the passion came upon them and they recalled their promise they got sheepishly on a street car and made for the town limits, and I need hardly tell you that when they got there they no longer wanted to swear. They had cooled off. The long spaces of the town, the people going about their ordinary business, nobody paying any attention to them, the world seeming to be at peace when they were at war, all brought them to a realization of the smallness of the whole business, and they turned around and came into town again. Comparing great things with small, that will suffice as a picture of the advantage of discussion in international matters as well as in individual matters, because it was universally agreed on the other side of the water that if Germany had allowed the other Governments to confer with her 24 hours about the recent war, it could not have taken place. We know why. It was an unconscionable war. She did not dare discuss it. You can not afford to discuss a thing when you are in the wrong, and the minute you feel that the whole judgment of the world is against you, you have a different temper in affairs altogether.

"This is a great process of discussion that we are entering into, and my point to-night—it is the point I want to leave with you—is that we are the people of all people in the world intelligently to discuss the difficulties of the nations which we represent, although we are Americans. We are the predestined mediators of mankind. I am not saying this in any kind of national pride or vanity. I believe that is mere historic truth, and I try to interpret circumstances in some intelligent way. If that is the kind of people we are, it must have been intended that we should make some use of the opportunities and powers that we have, and when I hear gentlemen saying that we must keep out of this thing and take care of ourselves I think to myself, 'Take care of ourselves? Where did we come from? Is there nobody else in the world to take care of? Have we no sympathies that do not run out into the great field of human experience everywhere? Is that what America is, with her mixture of bloods?' Why, my fellow citizens, that is a fundamental misconception of what it is to be an American, and these gentlemen are doing a harm which they do not realize. I want to testify to you here to-night, my fellow citizens, because I have the means of information, that since it has seemed to be uncertain whether we are going to play this part of leadership in the world or not, this part of leadership in accommodation, the old intrigues have stirred up in this country again. That intrigue which we universally condemn—that hyphen which looked to us like a snake, the hyphen between 'German' and 'American'—has reared its head again, and you hear the 'his-s-s' of its purpose. What is that purpose? It is to keep America out of the concert of nations, in order that America and Germany, being out of that concert, may stand—in their mistaken dream—united to dominate the world, or, at any rate, the one assist the other in holding the nations of the world off while its ambitions are realized.

"There is no conjecture about this, my fellow citizens. We know the former purposes of German intrigue in this country, and they are being revived. Why? We have not reduced very materially the number of the German people. Germany remains the great power of central Europe. She has more than 60,000,000 people now (she had nearly 70,000,000 before Poland and other Provinces were taken away). You can not change the temper and expectations of a people by five years of war, particularly five years of war in which they are not yet conscious of the wrong they did or of the wrong way in which they did it. They are expecting the time of the revival of their power, and along with the revival of their power goes their extraordinary capacity, their unparalleled education, their great capacity in commerce and finance and manufacture. The German bankers and the German merchants and the German manufacturers did not want this war. They were making conquest of the world without it, and they knew that it would spoil their plans, not advance them; and it has spoiled their plans, but they are there yet with their capacity, with their conception of what it is to serve the world materially and so subdue the world psychologically. All of that is still there, my fellow countrymen, and if America stays out then the rest of the world will have to watch Germany and watch America, and when there are two dissociated powers there is danger that they will have the same purposes.

"There can be only one intelligent reason for America staying out of this, and that is that she does not want peace, that she wants war sometimes and the advantage which war will bring her, and I want to say now and here that the men who think that by that thought they are interpreting America are making the sort of mistake upon which it will be useful for them to reflect in obscurity for the rest of their lives. This is a peaceful people. This is a liberty-loving people, and liberty is suffocated by war. Free institutions can not survive the strain of prolonged military administration. In order to live tolerable lives you must lift the fear of war and the practice of war from the lives of nations. America is evidence of the fact that no great democracy ever entered upon an aggressive international policy. I want you to know, if you will be kind enough to read the covenant of the league of nations—most of the people that are arguing against it are taking it for granted that you have never read it—take the pains to read it, and you will find that no nation is admitted to the league of nations that can not show that it has the institutions which we call free. Nobody is admitted except the self-governing nations, because it was the instinctive judgment of every man who sat around that board that only a nation whose government was its servant and not its master could be trusted to preserve the peace of the world. There are not going to be many other kinds of nations long, my fellow citizens. The people of this world—not merely the people of America, for they did the job long ago—have determined that there shall be no more autocratic governments.

"And in their haste to get rid of one of them they set up another. I mean in pitiful Russia. I wish we could learn the lesson of Russia so that it would be burned into the consciousness of every man and woman in America. That lesson is that nobody can be free where there is not public order and authority. What has happened in Russia is that an old and distinguished and skillful autocracy has had put in its place an amateur autocracy, a little handful of men exercising without the slightest compunction of mercy or pity the bloody terror that characterized the worst days of the Czar. That is what must happen if you knock things to pieces. Liberty is a thing of slow construction. Liberty is a thing of universal cooperation. Liberty is a thing which you must build up by habit. Liberty is a thing which is rooted and grounded in character, and the reason I am so certain that the leadership of the world, in respect of order and progress, belongs to America is that I know that these principles are rooted and grounded in the American character. It is not our intellectual capacity, my fellow citizens, that has given us our place in the world, though I rate that as high as the intellectual capacity of any other people that ever lived, but it is the heart that lies back of the man that makes America. Ask this question of yourselves. I have no doubt that this room is full of mothers and fathers and wives and sweethearts who sent their beloved young men to France. What did you send them there for? What made you proud that they were going? What made you willing that they should go? Did you think they were seeking to aggrandize America in some way? Did you think they were going to take something for America that had belonged to somebody else? Did you think that they were going in a quarrel which they had provoked and must maintain? The question answers itself. You were proud that they should go because they were going on an errand of self-sacrifice, in the interest of mankind. What a halo and glory surrounds those old men whom we now greet with such reverence, the men who were the soldiers in our Civil War! They saved a Nation. Ah, when these youngsters grow old who have come back from the fields of France, what a halo will be around their brows! They saved the world. They are of the same stuff as those old veterans of the Civil War. Mind you, I was born and bred in the South, but I can pay that tribute with all my heart to the men who saved the Union. It ought to have been saved. It was the greatest thing that men had conceived up to that time. Now we come to a greater thing—to the union of great nations in conference upon the interests of peace. That is the fruitage, the fine and appropriate fruitage, of what these men achieved upon the fields of France.

"I saw many fine sights in Paris, many gallant sights, many sights that quickened the pulse; but my pulse never beat so fast as when I saw groups of our boys swinging along the street. They looked as if they owned something, and they did. They owned the finest thing in the world, the thing that we are going to prove was theirs. They owned the ideals and conceptions that will govern the world. And on this errand that I am going about on I feel that I am doing what I can to complete what they so gallantly began. I should feel recreant, my fellow citizens, if I did not do all that is in my power to do to complete the ideal work which those youngsters so gallantly began.

"This was a war to make similar wars impossible, and merely to win this war and stop at that is to make it certain that we shall have to fight another and a final one. I hear opponents of the league of nations say, 'But this does not guarantee peace.' No; nothing guarantees us against human passion and error, but I would like to put this business proposition to you: If it increases the probability of peace by, let us say, 10 per cent, do you not think it is worth while? In my judgment, it increases it about 99 per cent. Henceforth the genius of the world will be devoted to accommodating the counsels of mankind and not confusing them; not supplying heat but supplying light; not putting friction into the machine, but easing the friction off and combining the parts of the great machinery of civilization so that they will run in smooth harmony and perfection. My fellow citizens, the tasks of peace that are ahead of us are the most difficult tasks to which the human genius has ever been devoted. I will state the fundamental task, for it is the fundamental task. It is the relationship between those who toil with their hands and those who direct that toil. I will not say the relationship between capital and labor; that means something slightly different. I say the relationship between those who organize enterprise and those who make enterprise go by the skill and labor of their hands. There is at present, to say the least, a most unsatisfactory relationship between those two and we must devote our national genius to working out a method of association between the two which will make this Nation the nation to solve triumphantly and for all time the fundamental problem of peaceful production. You ask, 'What has that got to do with the league of nations?' I dare say that you do not know, because I have never heard anybody tell you that the great charter, the new international charter, of labor is in the treaty of peace and associated with the league of nations. A great machinery of consultation is set up there, not merely about international political affairs, but about standards of labor, about the relationships between managers and employees, about the standards of life and the conditions of labor, about the labor of women and of children, about the humane side and the business side of the whole labor problem. And the first conference is going to sit in Washington next month; not the conference which some of you may have heard of, which I have just called of our own people, but an international conference to consider the interests of labor all over the round world. I do not know—nobody knows—whether the Senate will have stopped debating by that time or not. I heard a Member of the Senate say that nobody knew that except God Almighty! But whether it has finished or not, the conference is going to sit, and if it has not finished, the only question that will be left unsettled is whether we are going to sit inside of it or outside of it. The conference at Paris voted, in their confidence in the American people, that the first meeting should be held in Washington and should be called by the President of the United States. They supposed in their innocence that the President of the United States represented the people of the United States. And in calling this conference, as I have called it, I am confident that I am representing the people of the United States. After I have bidden the delegates welcome, perhaps I can have a chair just outside the door and listen.

"I am jesting, my fellow citizens, but there is a little sadness in the jest. Why do we wait to do a great thing? Why do we wait to fulfill the destiny of America? Why do we make it possible that anybody should think that we are not coming in now, but are going to wait later and come in with Germany? I suppose there is a certain intellectual excitement and pleasure in debate, but I do not experience any when great issues like this are pending, and I would be very sad, indeed, if I did not have an absolute, unclouded confidence of the result. I had the great good fortune to be born an American, I have saturated myself in the traditions of our country, I have read all the great literature that interprets the spirit of our country, and when I read my own heart with regard to these great purposes, I feel confident that it is a sample American heart. Therefore I have the most unbounded confidence in the result. All that is needed is that you should be vocal and audible. I know what you want. Say it and get it. I am your servant; all the men elected to go to Washington are your servants. It is not our privilege to follow our private convictions; it is our duty to represent your convictions and execute your purposes, and therefore all that is needed is a consciousness. Tell me that you do not want to do what I am urging and I will go home; but tell me, as your faces and your voices tell me, that you do want what I want, and I will be heartened for the rest of my journey, and I will say to the folks all the way from here to the Pacific, 'Minnesota is up and on her tiptoes and behind you. Let's all of us get in the great team which is to redeem the destinies of mankind.'

"Our fathers of the revolutionary age had a vision, my fellow citizens. There were only 3,000,000 Americans then, in a little strip of settlements on the Atlantic coast. Now the great body of American citizens extends from ocean to ocean, more than a hundred millions strong. These are the people of whom the founders of the Republic were dreaming, those great hosts of free men and women who should come in the future and who should say to all the world, 'Here are the testaments of liberty. Here are the principles of freedom. Here are the things which we must do in order that mankind may be released from the intolerable things of the past.' And there came a day at Paris when the representatives of all the great governments of the world accepted the American specifications upon which the terms of the treaty of peace were drawn. Shall we have our treaty, or shall we have somebody else's? Shall we keep the primacy of the world, or shall we abandon it?"

THE PRESIDENT AT BISMARCK, N. DAK., SEPTEMBER 10, 1919.

"Gov. Frazier, my fellow countrymen, I esteem it a great privilege to stand in your presence and to continue the discussion that I have been attempting in other parts of the country of the great matter which is pending for our determination. I say that it is pending for our determination, because, after all, it is a question for the thoughtful men and women of the United States. I believe that the gentlemen at Washington are trying to assess the opinion of the United States and are trying to embody and express it.

"It seems very strange from day to day as I go about that I should be discussing the question of peace. It seems very strange that after six months of conference in Paris, where the minds of more than 20 nations were brought together and where, after the most profound consideration of every question and every angle of every question concerned, an extraordinary agreement should have been reached—that while every other country concerned has stopped debating the peace, America is debating it. It seems very strange to me, my fellow countrymen, because, as a matter of fact, we are debating the question of peace or war. There is only one way to have peace, and that is to have it by the concurrence of the minds of the world. America can not bring about peace by herself. No other nation can bring about peace by itself. The agreement of a small group of nations can not bring about peace. The world is not at peace. It is not, except in certain disturbed quarters, actually using military means of war, but the mind of the world is not at peace. The mind of the world is waiting for the verdict, and the verdict they are waiting for is this, Shall we have in the future the same dangers, the same suspicions, the same distractions, and shall we expect that out of those dangers and distractions armed conflict will arise? Or shall we expect that the world will be willing to sit down at the council table to talk the thing over; to delay all use of force until the world has had time to express its judgment upon the matter at issue? If that is not to be the solution, if the world is not to substitute discussion and arbitration for war, then the world is not now in a state of mind to have peace, even for the time being. While victory has been won, my fellow countrymen, it has been won only over the force of a particular group of nations. It has not been won over the passions of those nations, or over the passions of the nations that were set against them. This treaty which I brought back with me is a great world settlement, and it tries to deal with some of the elements of passion which were likely at any time to blaze out in the world and which did blaze out and set the world on fire.

"The trouble was at the heart of Europe. At the heart of Europe there were suffering peoples, inarticulate but with hearts on fire against the iniquities practiced against them; held in the grip of military power and submitting to nothing but force; their spirits insurgent; and so long as that continued, there could not be the expectation of continued peace. This great settlement at Paris for the first time in the world considered the cry of the peoples and did not listen to the plea of governments. It did not listen to dynastic claims. It did not read over the whole story of rival territorial ambitions. It said, 'The day is closed for that. These lands belong to the stocks, the ancient stocks of people that live upon them, and we are going to give them to those people and say to them, "The land always should have been yours; it is now yours, and you can govern it as you please."' That is the principle that is at the heart of this treaty, but if that principle can not be maintained then there will ensue upon it the passion that dwelt in the hearts of those peoples, a despair which will bring about universal chaos. Men in despair do not construct governments. Men in despair destroy governments. Men whose whole affairs are so upset, whose whole systems of transportation are so disordered that they can not get food, that they can not get clothes, that they can not turn to any authority that can give them anything, run amuck. They do not stop to ask questions. I heard a very thoughtful pastor once preach a sermon which interested me very deeply, on the sequence of the petitions in the Lord's Prayer. He called attention to the fact that the first petition was, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' and he pointed out that our Saviour probably knew better than anybody else that a man can not serve God or his fellow men on an empty stomach, that he has got to be physically sustained. When a man has got an empty stomach, most of all when those he loves are starving, he is not going to serve any government; he is going to serve himself by the quickest way he can find.

"You say, 'What has this got to do with the adoption by the United States Senate of the treaty of peace?' It has this to do with it, my fellow citizens, that the whole world is waiting upon us, and if we stay out of it, if we qualify our assent in any essential way, the world will say, 'Then there can be no peace, for that great Nation in the west is the only makeweight which will hold these scales steady.' I hear counsels of selfishness uttered. I hear men say, 'Very well, let us stay out and take care of ourselves and let the rest of the world take care of itself.' I do not agree with that from the point of view of sentiment. I would be ashamed to agree with it from the point of view of sentiment, and I think I have intelligence enough to know that it would not work, even if I wanted it to work. Are we disconnected from the rest of the world? Take a single item. If Europe is disordered, who is going to buy wheat? There is more wheat in this country than we can consume. There is more foodstuffs in this country of many sorts than we can consume. There is no foreign market that anybody can count on wherein there is settled peace. Men are not going to buy until they know what is going to happen to-morrow, for the very good reason that they can not get any money; they can not earn any money amidst a disordered organization of industry and the absence of those processes of credit which keep business going.

"We have managed in the process of civilization, my fellow citizens, to make a world that can not be taken to pieces. The pieces are dovetailed and intimately fitted with one another, and unless you assemble them as you do the intimate parts of a great machine, civilization will not work. I believe that, with the exception of the United States, there is not a country in the world that can live without importation. There are only one or two countries that can live without imported foodstuffs. There are no countries that I know of that can live in their ordinary way without importing manufactured goods or raw materials, raw materials of many kinds. Take that great kingdom, for example, for which I have the most intimate sympathy, the great Kingdom of Italy. There are no raw materials worth mentioning in Italy. There are great factories there, but they have to get all the raw materials that they manufacture from outside Italy. There is no coal in Italy, no fuel. They have to get all their coal from outside of Italy, and at the present moment because the world is holding its breath and waiting the great coal fields of Central Europe are not being worked except to about 40 per cent of their capacity. The coal in Silesia, the coal in Bohemia, is not being shipped out, and industries are checked and chilled and drawn in, and starvation comes nearer, unemployment becomes more and more universal. At this moment there is nothing brought to my attention more often at Washington than the necessity for shipping out our fuel and our raw materials to start the world again. If we do not start the world again, then we check and stop to that extent our own industries and our exportations, of course. You can not disentangle the United States from the rest of the world. If the rest of the world goes bankrupt, the business of the United States is in a way to be ruined. I do not like to put the thing upon this basis, my fellow citizens, because this is not the American basis. America was not founded to make money; it was founded to lead the world on the way to liberty, and now, while we debate, all the rest of the world is saying, 'Why does America hesitate? We want to follow her. We shall not know which way to go unless she leads. We want the direction of her business genius. We want the suggestions of her principles, and she hesitates. She does not know whether she wants to go or not.' Oh, yes, she does, my fellow citizens. Men among us do not know whether we want to go in or not, but we know. There is no more danger of America staying out of this great thing than there is of her reversing all the other processes of her history and forgetting all the principles that she has spilt so much precious blood to maintain. But, in the meantime, the delay is injuring the whole world and ourselves, of course, along with the rest, because we are a very big and, in my opinion, an extremely important part of the world.

"I have told many times, but I must tell you again, of the experience that I had in Paris. Almost every day of the week that I was not imperatively engaged otherwise I was receiving delegations. Delegations from where? Not merely groups of men from France and other near-by regions, but groups of men from all over the world—as I have several times admitted, from some parts of the world that I never heard the names of before. I do not think they were in geography when I was at school. If they were, I had forgotten them. Did you ever hear of Adjur-Badjan, for example? A very dignified group of fine-looking men came in from Adjur-Badjan. I did not dare ask them where it was, but I looked it up secretly afterwards and found that it was a very prosperous valley region lying south of the Caucasus and that it had a great and ancient civilization. I knew from what these men said to me that they knew what they were talking about, though I did not know anything about their affairs. They knew, above all things else, what America stood for, and they had come to me, figuratively speaking, with outstretched hands and said, 'We want the guidance and the help and the advice of America.' And they all said that, until my heart grew fearful, and I said to one group of them, 'I beg that you will not expect the impossible. America can not do the things that you are asking her to do. We will do the best we can. We will stand as your friends. We will give you every sort of aid that we can give you, but please do not expect the impossible.' They believe that America can work miracles merely by being America and asserting the principles of America throughout the globe, and that kind of assertion, my fellow citizens, is the process of peace; and that is the only possible process of peace.

"When I say, therefore, that I have come here this morning actually to discuss the question with you whether we shall have peace or war, you may say, 'There is no war; the war is over.' The fighting is over, but there is not peace, and there can not be peace without the assistance of America. The assistance of America comes just at the center of the whole thing that was planned in Paris. You have heard some men talk about separating the covenant of the league of nations from the treaty. I intended to bring a copy of the treaty with me; it is a volume as thick as that, and the very first thing in it is the league of nations covenant. By common consent that was put first, because by common consent that is the only thing that will make the rest of the volume work. That was not the opinion at the beginning of the conference. There were a great many cynics on that side of the water who smiled indulgently when you spoke hopefully of drawing the nations together in a common consent of action, but before we got through there was not a man who had not as a hard, practical judgment, come to the conclusion that we could not do without it, that you could not make a world settlement without setting up an organization that would see that it was carried out, and that you could not compose the mind of the world unless that settlement included an arrangement by which discussion should be substituted for war.

"If the war that we have just had had been preceded by discussion, it never would have happened. Every foreign office in Europe urged through its minister at Berlin that no action should be taken until there should be an international conference and the other governments should learn what if any processes of mediation they might interpose. And Germany did not dare delay it for 24 hours. If she had, she never could have begun it. You dare not lay a bad case before mankind. You dare not kill the young men of the world for a dishonest purpose. We have let thousands of our lads go to their death in order to convince, not Germany merely, but any other nation that may have in the back of its thought a similar enterprise that the world does not means to permit any iniquity of that sort, and if it had been displayed as an iniquity in open conference for not less than nine months, as the covenant of the league of nations provides, it never could have happened.

"Your attention is called to certain features of this league—the only features to which your attention ever is called by those who are opposed to it and you are left with the impression that it is an arrangement by which war is just on the hair trigger. You are constantly told about article 10. Now, article 10 has no operative force in it unless we vote that it shall operate. I will tell you what article 10 is; I think I can repeat it almost verbatim. Under article 10 every member of the league undertakes to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and the existing political independence of the other members of the league. So far so good. The second sentence provides that in case of necessity the council of the league shall advise what steps are necessary to carry out the obligations of that promise; that is to say, what force is necessary if any. The council can not give that advice without a unanimous vote. It can not give the advice, therefore, without the affirmative vote of the United States, unless the United States is a party to the controversy in question. Let us see what that means. Do you think the United States is likely to seize somebody else's territory? Do you think the United States is likely to disregard the first sentence of the article? And if she is not likely to begin an aggression of that sort, who is likely to begin it against her? Is Mexico going to invade us and appropriate Texas? Is Canada going to come down with her nine or ten millions and overwhelm the hundred millions of the United States? Who is going to grab territory, and, above all things else, who is going to entertain the idea if the rest of the world has said, 'No; we are all pledged to see that you do not do that.' But suppose that somebody does attempt to grab our territory or that we do attempt to grab somebody else's territory. Then the war is ours anyhow. Then what difference does it make what advice the council gives? Unless it is our war we can not be dragged into a war without our own consent. If that is not an open and shut security, I do not know of any. Yet that is article 10.

"I do not recognize this covenant when I hear some other men talk about it. I spent hours and hours in the presence of the representatives of 13 other Governments examining every sentence of it, up and down and crosswise, and trying to keep out of it anything that interfered with the essential sovereignty of any member of the league. I carried over with me in March all the suggestions made by the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and they were all accepted, and yet I come back and find that I do not understand what the document means. I am told that plain sentences which I thought were unmistakable English terms mean something that I never heard of and that nobody else ever intended as a purpose. But whatever you may think of article 10, my fellow citizen, it is the heart of the treaty. You have either got to take it or you have got to throw the world back into that old conquest over land titles, which would upset the State of North Dakota or any other part of the world. Suppose there were no guaranty of any land title in North Dakota! I can fancy how every farmer and every man with a city lot would go armed. He would hire somebody, if he was too sleepy to sit up all night, to see that nobody trespassed and took squatter possession of his unsecured land. We have been trying to do something analogus to that with the territories of Europe; to fix the land titles, and then having fixed them, we have got to have article 10. Under article 10 these titles are established, and we all join to guarantee their maintenance. There is no other way to quiet the world, and if the world is not quieted, then America is sooner or later involved in the mêlée. We boast, my fellow citizens—but we sometimes forget—what a powerful Nation the United States is. Do you suppose we can ask the other nations of the world to forget that we are out of the arrangement? Do you suppose that we can stay out of the arrangement without being suspected and intrigued against and hated by all the rest of them? And do you think that is an advantageous basis for international transactions? Any way you take this question you are led straight around to this alternative, either this treaty with this covenant or a disturbed world and certain war. There is no escape from it.

"America recalls, I am sure, all the assurances that she has given to the world in the years past. Some of the very men who are now opposing this covenant were the most eloquent advocates of an international concert which would be carried to a point where the exercise of independent sovereignty would be almost estopped. They put it into measures of Congress. For example, in one, I believe the last, Navy appropriation bill, by unanimous vote of the committee, they put in the provision that after the building program had been authorized by Congress the President could cancel it if in the meantime he had been able to induce the other Governments of the world to set up an international tribunal which would settle international difficulties. They actually had the matter so definitely in mind that they authorized the President not to carry out an act of Congress with regard to the building of great ships if he could get an arrangement similar to the arrangement which I have now laid before them, because their instinctive judgment is, my instinctive judgment and yours is, that we have no choice, if we want to stop war, but to take the steps that are necessary to stop war.

"If we do not enter into this covenant, what is our situation? Our situation is exactly the situation of Germany herself, except that we are not disarmed and Germany is disarmed. We have joined with the rest of the world to defeat the objects that Germany had in mind. We now do not even sign the treaty, let us suppose, that disarms Germany. She is disarmed, nevertheless, because the other nations will enter into the treaty, and there, planted in her heart, planted in the heart of those 60,000,000 people, is this sense of isolation; it may be this sense that some day, by gathering force and change of circumstances, they may have another chance, and the only other nation that they can look to is the United States. The United States has repudiated the guaranty. The United States has said, 'Yes; we sent 2,000,000 men over there to accomplish this, but we do not like it now that we have accomplished it and we will not guarantee the consequences. We are going to stay in such a situation that some day we may send 2,000,000 more over there. We promised the mothers and the fathers and the wives and the sweethearts that these men were fighting so that this thing should not happen again, but we are now to arrange it so that it may happen again.' So the two nations that will stand and play a lone hand in the world would be Germany and the United States.

"I am not pointing this out to you, my fellow citizens, because I think it is going to happen. I know it is not. I am not in the least troubled about that; but I do want you to share fully with me the thought that I have brought back from Europe. I know what I am talking about when I say that America is the only nation whose guaranty will suffice to substitute discussion for war, and I rejoice in the circumstance. I rejoice that the day has come when America can fulfill her destiny. Her destiny was expressed much more in her open doors, for she said to the oppressed all over the world, 'Come and join us; we will give you freedom; we will give you opportunity; we have no governments that can act as your masters. Come and join us to conduct the great government which is our own.' And they came in thronging millions, and their genius was added to ours, their sturdy capacity multiplied and increased the capacity of the United States; and now, with the blood of every great people in our veins, we turn to the rest of the world and say, 'We still stand ready to redeem you. We still believe in liberty. We still mean to exercise every force that we have and, if need be, spend every dollar that is ours to vindicate the standards of justice and of right.'

"It is a noble prospect. It is a noble opportunity. My pulses quicken at the thought of it. I am glad to have lived in a day when America can redeem her pledges to the world, when America can prove that her leadership is the leadership that leads out of these age-long troubles, these age-long miseries into which the world will not sink back, but which, without our assistance, it may struggle out of only through a long period of bloody revolution. The peoples of Europe are in a revolutionary frame of mind. They do not believe in the things that have been practiced upon them in the past, and they mean to have new things practiced. In the meantime they are, some of them, like pitiful Russia, in danger of doing a most extraordinary thing, substituting one kind of autocracy for another. Russia repudiated the Czar, who was cruel at times, and set up her present masters, who are cruel all the time and pity nobody, who seize everybody's property and feed only the soldiers that are fighting for them; and now, according to the papers, they are likely to brand every one of those soldiers so that he may not easily, at any rate, escape their clutches and desert. Branding their servants and making slaves of a great and lovable people! There is no people in the world fuller of the naive sentiments of good will and of fellowship than the people of Russia, and they are in the grip of a cruel autocracy that dare not, though challenged by every friendly Government in Europe, assemble a constituency; they dare not appeal to the people. They know that their mastery would end the minute the people took charge of their own affairs.

"Do not let us expose any of the rest of the world to the necessity of going through any such terrible experience as that, my fellow countrymen. We are at present helpless to assist Russia, because there are no responsible channels through which we can assist her. Our heart goes out to her, but the world is disordered, and while it is disordered—we debate!"

THE PRESIDENT, FROM REAR PLATFORM, MANDAN, N. DAK., SEPTEMBER 10, 1919.

"I am glad to get out to see the real folks, to feel the touch of their hand, and know, as I have come to know, how the Nation stands together in the common purpose to complete what the boys did who carried their guns with them over the sea. We may think that they finished that job, but they will tell you they did not; that unless we see to it that peace is made secure, they will have the job to do over again, and we in the meantime will rest under a constant apprehension that we may have to sacrifice the flower of our youth again. The whole country has made up its mind that that shall not happen; and presently, after a reasonable time is allowed for unnecessary debate, we will get out of all this period of doubt and unite the whole force and influence of the United States to steady the world in the lines of peace. It will be the proudest thing and finest thing that America ever did. She was born to do these things, and now she is going to do them.

"I am very much obliged to you for coming out."

THE PRESIDENT AT AUDITORIUM, BILLINGS, MONT., SEPTEMBER 11, 1919.

"Mr. Mayor, Judge Pierson, my fellow countrymen, it is with genuine pleasure that I face this company and realize that I am in the great State of Montana. I have long wanted to visit this great State and come into contact with its free and vigorous population, and I want to thank Judge Pierson for the happy word that he used in speaking of my errand. He said that I had come to consult with you. That is exactly what I have come to do. I have come to consult with you in the light of certain circumstances which I want to explain to you, circumstances which affect not only this great Nation which we love, and of which we try to constitute an honorable part, but also affect the whole world. I wonder when we speak of the whole world whether we have a true conception of the fact that the human heart beats everywhere the same. Nothing impressed me so much on the other side of the water as the sort of longing for sympathy which those people exhibited. The people of France, for example, feeling keenly as they do the terrors that they have suffered at the hands of the enemy, are never so happy as when they realize that we across the sea at a great distance feel with them the keen arrows of sorrow that have penetrated their hearts and are glad that our boys went over there to help rescue them from the terror that lay upon them day and night.

What I have come to say to you to-day, my friends, is this: We are debating the treaty of peace with Germany and we are making the mistake, I take the liberty of saying, of debating it as if it were an ordinary treaty with some particular country, a treaty which we could ourselves modify without complicating the affairs of the world; whereas, as a matter of fact, this is not merely a treaty with Germany. Matters were drawn into this treaty which affected the peace and happiness of the whole Continent of Europe, and not of the Continent of Europe merely, but of forlorn populations in Africa, of peoples that we hardly know about in Asia, in the Far East and everywhere the influence of German policy had extended and everywhere that influence had to be corrected, had to be checked, had to be altered. What I want to impress upon you to-day is that it is this treaty or none. It is this treaty because we can have no other.

"Consider the circumstances. For the first time in the world some 20 nations sent their most thoughtful and responsible men to consult together at the capital of France to effect a settlement of the affairs of the world, and I want to render my testimony that these gentlemen entered upon their deliberations with great openness of mind. Their discussions were characterized by the utmost candor, and they realize, my fellow citizens, what as a student of history I venture to say no similar body ever acknowledged before, that they were nobody's masters, that they did not have the right to follow the line of any national advantage in determining what the settlements of the peace should be, but that they were the servants of their people and the servants of the people of the world. This settlement, my fellow citizens, is the first international settlement that was intended for the happiness of the average men and women throughout the world. This is indeed and in truth a people's treaty, and it is the first people's treaty, and I venture to express the opinion that it is not wise for Parliaments or Congresses to attempt to alter it. It is a people's treaty, notwithstanding the fact that we call it a treaty with Germany; and while it is a treaty with Germany, and in some senses a very severe treaty, indeed, it is not an unjust treaty, as some have characterized it. My fellow citizens, Germany tried to commit a crime against civilization, and this treaty is justified in making Germany pay for that criminal error up to the ability of her payment. Some of the very gentlemen who are now characterizing this treaty as too harsh are the same men who less than a twelvemonth ago were criticizing the administration at Washington in the fear that they would compound with Germany and let her off from the payment of the utmost that she could pay in retribution for what she had done. They were pitiless then; they are pitiful now.

"It is very important, my fellow citizens, that we should not forget what this war meant. I am amazed at the indications that we are forgetting what we went through. There are some indications that on the other side of the water they are apt to forget what they went through. I venture to think that there are thousands of mothers and fathers and wives and sisters and sweethearts in this country who are never going to forget. Thousands of our gallant youth lie buried in France, and buried for what? For the redemption of America? America was not directly attacked. For the salvation of America? America was not immediately in danger. No; for the salvation of mankind. It is the noblest errand that troops ever went on. I was saying the other day in the presence of a little handful of men whom I revered, veterans of our Civil War, that it seemed to me that they fought for the greatest thing that there was to fight for in their day, and you know with what reverence we have regarded all the men who fought in the ranks in the Civil War for the Union. I am saying this out of a full heart, though I was born on the other side of the Mason and Dixon line. We revere the men who saved the Union. What are going to be our sentiments with regard to these boys in khaki and the boys who have just been in khaki in this war? Do you not think that when they are old men a halo will seem to be about them, because they were crusaders for the liberty of the world? One of the hardest things for me to do during this war, as for many another man in this country, was merely to try to direct things and not take a gun and go myself. When I feel the pride that I often have felt in having been the Commander in Chief of these gallant armies and those splendid boys at sea, I think, 'Ah, that is fine, but, oh, to have been one of them and to have accomplished this great thing which has been accomplished!'

"The fundamental principle of this treaty is a principle never acknowledged before, a principle which had its birth and has had its growth in this country, that the countries of the world belong to the people who live in them, and that they have a right to determine their own destiny and their own form of government and their own policy, and that no body of statesmen, sitting anywhere, no matter whether they represent the overwhelming physical force of the world or not, has the right to assign any great people to a sovereignty under which it does not care to live. This is the great treaty which is being debated. This is the treaty which is being examined with a microscope. This is the treaty which is being pulled about, and about which suggestions are made as to changes of phraseology. Why, my friends, are you going to be so nearsighted as to look that way at a great charter of human liberty? The thing is impossible. You can not have any other treaty, because you can never get together again the elements that agreed to this treaty. You can not do it by dealing with separate governments. You can not assemble the forces again that were back of it. You can not bring the agreement upon which it rests into force again. It was the laborious work of many, many months of the most intimate conference. It has very, very few compromises in it and is, most of it, laid down in straight lines according to American specifications. The choice is either to accept this treaty or play a lone hand. What does that mean? To play a lone hand means that we must always be ready to play by ourselves. That means that we must always be armed, that we must always be ready to mobilize the man strength and the manufacturing resources of the country; it means that we must continue to live under not diminishing but increasing taxes; it means that we shall devote our thought and the organization of our Government to being strong enough to beat any nation in the world. An absolute reversal of all the ideals of American history! If you are going to play a lone hand, the hand that you play must be upon the handle of the sword. You can not play a lone hand and do your civil business except with the other hand—one hand incidental for the business of peace, the other hand constantly for the assertion of force. It is either this treaty or a lone hand, and the lone hand must have a weapon in it. The weapon must be all the young men of the country trained to arms, and the business of the country must pay the piper, must pay for the whole armament, the arms and the men. That is the choice. Do you suppose, my fellow citizens, that any nation is going to stand for that? We are not the only people who are sick of war. We are not the only people who have made up our minds that our Government must devote its attention to peace and to justice and to right. The people all over the world have made up their minds as to that. We need peace more than we ever needed it before. We need ordered peace, calm peace, settled peace, assured peace—for what have we to do? We have to reregulate the fortunes of men. We have to reconstruct the machinery of civilization. I use the words deliberately—we have to reconstruct the machinery of civilization.

"The central fact of the modern world is universal unrest, and the unrest is not due merely to the excitement of a recent war. The unrest is not due merely to the fact of recent extraordinary circumstances. It is due to a universal conviction that the conditions under which men live and labor are not satisfactory. It is a conviction all over the world that there is no use talking about political democracy unless you have also industrial democracy. You know what this war interrupted in the United States. We were searching our own hearts, we were looking closely at our own methods of doing business. A great many were convinced that the control of the business of this country was in too few hands. Some were convinced that the credit of the country was controlled by small groups of men, and the great Federal reserve act and the great land-bank act were passed in order to release the resources of the country on a broader and more generous scale. We had not finished dealing with monopolies. We have not finished dealing with monopolies. With monopolies there can be no industrial democracy. With the control of the few, of whatever kind or class, there can be no democracy of any sort. The world is finding that out—in some portions of it in blood and terror.

"Look what has happened in Russia, my fellow citizens. I find wherever I go in America that my fellow citizens feel as I do, an infinite pity for that great people, an infinite longing to be of some service to them. Everybody who has mixed with the Russian people tells me that they are among the most lovable people in the world, a very gentle people, a very friendly people, a very simple people, and in their local life a very democratic people, people who easily trust you, and who expect you to be trustworthy as they are. Yet this people is delivered into the hands of an intolerable tyranny. It came out of one tyranny to get into a worse. A little group of some 30 or 40 men are the masters of that people at present. Nobody elected them. They chose themselves. They maintain their power by the sword, and they maintain the sword by seizing all the food of the country and letting only those who will fight for them eat, the rest of them to go starved; and because they can command no loyalty we are told by the newspapers that they are about to brand the men under arms for them, so that they will be forever marked as their servants and slaves. That is what pitiful Russia has got in for, and there will be many a bloody year, I am afraid, before she finds herself again.

"I speak of Russia. Have you seen no symptoms of the spread of that sort of chaotic spirit into other countries? If you had been across the sea with me, you would know that the dread in the mind of every thoughtful man in Europe is that that distemper will spread to their countries, that before there will be settled order there will be tragical disorder. Have you heard nothing of the propaganda of that sort of belief in the United States? That poison is running through the veins of the world, and we have made the methods of communication throughout the world such that all the veins of the world are open and the poison can circulate. The wireless throws it out upon the air. The cable whispers it underneath the sea. Men talk about it in little groups, men talk about it openly in great groups not only in Europe but here also in the United States. There are apostles of Lenin in our own midst. I can not imagine what it means to be an apostle of Lenin. It means to be an apostle of the night, of chaos, of disorder; there can be no creed of disorganization. Our immediate duty, therefore, my fellow countrymen, is to see that no minority, no class, no special interest, no matter how respectable, how rich, how poor, shall get control of the affairs of the United States.

"The singular thing about the sort of disorder that prevails in Russia is that while every man is, so to say, invited to take what he can get, he can not keep it when he gets it, because, even if you had leave to steal, which is the leave very generously given in Russia at present, you have got to get somebody to help you to keep what you steal. Without organization you can not get any help, so the only thing you can do is to dig a hole and find a cave somewhere. Disordered society is dissolved society. There is no society when there is not settled and calculable order. When you do not know what is going to happen to you to-morrow, you do not much care what is going to happen to you to-day. These are the things that confront us. The world must be satisfied of justice. The conditions of civilized life must be purified and perfected, and if we do not have peace, that is impossible. We must clear the decks of this matter we are now discussing. This is the best treaty that can possibly be got, and, in my judgment, it is a mighty good treaty, for it has justice, the attempt at justice at any rate, at the heart of it.

"Suppose that you were feeling that there was a danger of a general conflagration in your part of the country; I mean a literal fire. Which would you rather have, no insurance at all or 10 per cent insurance? Don't you think some insurance is better than none at all? Put the security obtained by this treaty at its minimum, and it is a great deal better than no security at all, and without it there is no security at all, and no man can be sure what his business will be from month to month, or what his life will be from year to year. The leisureliness of some debates creates the impression on my mind that some men think there is leisure. There is no leisure in the world, my fellow citizens, with regard to the reform of the conditions under which men live. There is no time for any talk, but get down to the business of what we are going to do.

"I dare say that many of you know that I have called a conference to sit in Washington the first of next month, a conference of men in the habit of managing business and of men engaged in manual labor, what we generally call employers and employees. I have called them together for the sake of getting their minds together, getting their purposes together, getting them to look at the picture of our life at the same time and in the same light and from the same angles, so that they can see the things that ought to be done. I am trying to apply there what is applied in the great covenant of the league of nations, that if there is any trouble, the thing to do is not to fight, but to sit around the table and talk it over. The league of nations substitutes discussion for fight, and without discussion there will be fight. One of the greatest difficulties that we have been through in the past is in getting men to understand that fundamental thing. There is a very interesting story and a very charming story told of a great English writer of a past generation. He was a man who stuttered a little bit, and he stuttered out some very acid comment on some man who was not present. One of his friends said, 'Why, Charles, I didn't know you knew him.' 'Oh, n-n-no,' he said, 'I-I d-d-don't k-know him; I-I c-c-can't hate a m-man I-I know.' How much truth there is in that, my fellow countrymen! You can not hate a fellow you know. I know some crooks that I can not help liking. I can judge them in cool blood and correctly only when they are not there. They are extremely fetching and attractive fellows; indeed, I suspect that a disagreeable fellow can not be a successful crook.

"But, to speak seriously, conference is the healing influence of civilization, and the real difficulty between classes, when a country is unfortunate enough to have classes, is that they do not understand one another. I sometimes think that the real barriers in life are the barriers of taste, that some people like one way of doing things and that other people do not like that way of doing things; that one sort of people are not comfortable unless the people they are with are dressed the way they are. I think that goes so much deeper than people realize. It is the absence of the ability to get at the point of view and look through the eyes of the persons with whom you are not accustomed to deal. In order, therefore, to straighten out the affairs of America, in order to calm and correct the ways of the world, the first and immediate requisite is peace, and it is an immediate requisite. We can not wait. It is not wise to wait, because we ought to devote our best thoughts, the best impulses of our hearts, the clearest thinking of our brain, to correcting the things that are wrong everywhere.

"I have been told, my fellow citizens, that this western part of the country is particularly pervaded with what is called radicalism. There is only one way to meet radicalism and that is to deprive it of food, and wherever there is anything wrong there is abundant food for radicalism. The only way to keep men from agitating against grievances is to remove the grievances, and as long as things are wrong I do not intend to ask men to stop agitating. I intend to beg that they will agitate in an orderly fashion; I intend to beg that they will use the orderly methods of counsel, and, it may be, the slow processes of correction which can be accomplished in a self-governing people through political means. Otherwise we will have chaos; but as long as there is something to correct, I say Godspeed to the men who are trying to correct it. That is the only way to meet radicalism. Radicalism means cutting up by the roots. Well, remove the noxious growth and there will be no cutting up by the roots. Then there will be the wholesome fruitage of an honest life from one end of this country to the other.

"In looking over some papers the other day I was reminded of a very interesting thing. The difficulty which is being found with the league of nations is that apparently the gentlemen who are discussing it unfavorably are afraid that we will be bound to do something we do not want to do. The only way in which you can have impartial determinations to this world is by consenting to something you do not want to do. Every time you have a case in court one or the other of the parties has to consent to do something he does not want to do. There is not a case in court, and there are hundreds of thousands of them every year, in which one of the parties is not disappointed. Yet we regard that as the foundation of civilization, that we will not fight about these things, and that when we lose in court we will take our medicine. Very well; I say that the two Houses of Congress suggested that there be an international court, and suggested that they were willing to take their medicine. They put it in a place where you would not expect it. They put it in the naval appropriation bill, and, not satisfied with putting it there once, they put it there several times; I mean in successive years. This is the sum of it:

"'It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to adjust and settle its international disputes through mediation or arbitration (that is, the league of nations), to the end that war may be honorably avoided. It looks with apprehension and disfavor upon a general increase of armament throughout the world, but it realizes that no single nation can disarm and that without a common agreement upon the subject every considerable power must maintain a relative standing in military strength. In view of the premises, the President is authorized and requested to invite at an appropriate time, not later than the close of the war in Europe (this immediately preceded our entry into the war), all the great Governments of the world to send representatives to a conference which shall be charged with the duty of formulating a plan for a court of arbitration or other tribunal to which disputed questions between nations shall be referred for adjustment and peaceful settlement, and to consider the question of disarmament and submit their recommendations to their respective Governments for approval. The President is hereby authorized to appoint,' etc. A provision for an appropriation to pay the expenses is also embodied.

"Now that they have got it, they do not like it. They also provided in this legislation that if there could be such an assemblage, if there could be such an agreement, the President was authorized to cancel the naval building program authorized by the bill, or so much of it as he thought was wise in the circumstances. They looked forward to it with such a practical eye that they contemplated the possibility of its coming soon enough to stop the building program of that bill. It came much sooner than they expected, and apparently has taken them so much by surprise as to confuse their minds. I suppose that this would be a very dull world if everybody were consistent, but consistency, my fellow citizens, in the sober, fundamental, underlying principles of civilization is a very serious thing indeed.

"If we are, indeed, headed toward peace with the real purpose of our hearts engaged, then we must take the necessary steps to secure it, and we must make the necessary sacrifices to secure it. I repudiate the suggestion which underlies some of the suggestions I have heard that the other nations of the world are acting in bad faith and that only the United States is acting in good faith. It is not true. I can testify that I was cooperating with honorable men on the other side of the water, and I challenge anybody to show where in recent years, while the opinion of mankind has been effective, there has been the repudiation of an international obligation by France or Italy or Great Britain or by Japan. Japan has kept her engagements, and Japan here engages to unite with the rest of the world in maintaining justice and a peace based upon justice. There can be cited no instances where these Governments have been dishonorable, and I need not add that there is, of course, no instance where the United States has not kept faith.

"When gentlemen discuss the right to withdraw from the league of nations and look suspiciously upon the clause which says that we can withdraw upon two years' notice, if at that time we have fulfilled our international obligations, I am inclined to ask, 'What are you worried about? Are you afraid that we will not have fulfilled our international obligations?' I am too proud an American to believe anything of the kind. We never have failed to fulfill our international obligations, and we never will, and our international obligations will always look toward the fulfillment of the highest purposes of civilization. When we came into existence as a Nation we promised ourselves and promised the world that we would serve liberty everywhere. We were only 3,000,000 strong then, and shall we, when more than a hundred million strong, fail to fulfill the promise that we made when we were weak? We have served mankind and we shall continue to serve mankind, for I believe, my fellow men, that we are the flower of mankind so far as civilization is concerned.

"Please do not let me leave the impression on your mind that I am arguing with you. I am not arguing this case; I am merely expounding it. I am just as sure what the verdict of this Nation is going to be as if it had been already rendered, and what has touched me and convinced me of this, my fellow citizens, is not what big men have told me, not what men of large affairs have said to me—I value their counsel and seek to be guided by it—but by what plain people have said to me, particularly by what women have said to me. When I see a woman plainly dressed, with the marks of labor upon her, and she takes my hand and says, 'God bless you, Mr. President; God bless the league of nations,' I know that the league of nations has gone to the heart of this people. A woman came up to me the other day and grasped my hand and said, 'God bless you!' and then turned away in tears. I asked a neighbor, 'What is the matter?' and he said, 'She intended to say something to you, sir, but she lost a son in France.' That woman did not take my hand with a feeling that her son ought not to have been sent to France. I sent her son to France, and she took my hand and blessed me, but she could not say anything more, because the whole well of spirit in her came up into her throat and the thing was unutterable. Down deep in it was the love of her boy, the feeling of what he had done, the justice and the dignity and the majesty of it, and then the hope that through such poor instrumentality as men like myself could offer no other woman's son would ever be called upon to lay his life down for the same thing. I tell you, my fellow citizens, the whole world is now in the state where you can fancy that there are hot tears upon every cheek, and those hot tears are tears of sorrow. They are also tears of hope. It is amazing how, through all the sorrows of mankind and all the unspeakable terrors and injustices that have been inflicted upon men, hope springs eternal in the human heart. God knows that men, and governments in particular, have done everything they knew how to kill hope in the human heart, but it has not died. It is the one conquering force in the history of mankind. What I am pleading for, therefore—not with you, for I anticipate your verdict—but what I am pleading for with the Senate of the United States is to be done with debate and release and satisfy the hope of the world."

THE PRESIDENT AT OPERA HOUSE, HELENA, MONT., SEPTEMBER 11, 1919.

"Gov. Stewart and my fellow countrymen, I very heartily echo what Gov. Stewart has just said. I am very glad that an occasion has arisen which has given me the opportunity and the pleasure of coming thus face to face with, at any rate, some of the people of the great State of Montana. I must hasten to say to you that I am not come from Washington so much to advise you as to get in touch with you, as to get the feeling of the purposes which are moving you, because, my fellow citizens, I may tell you as a secret that some people in Washington lose that touch. They do not know what the purposes are that are running through the hearts and minds of the people of this great country, and after one stays in Washington too long one is apt to catch that same reserve and numbness which seems to characterize others that are there. I like to come out and feel once more the thing that is the only real thing in public affairs, and that is the great movement of public opinion in the United States.

"I want to put the case very simply to you to-night, for with all its complexity, with all the many aspects which it wears there is a very simple question at the heart of it. That question is nothing more nor less than this: Shall the great sacrifice that we made in this war be in vain, or shall it not? I want to say to you very solemnly that, notwithstanding the splendid achievement of our soldiers on the other side of the sea, who I do not hesitate to say saved the world, notwithstanding the noble things that they did, their task is only half done and it remains for us to complete it. I want to explain that to you. I want to explain to you why, if we left the thing where it is and did not carry out the program of the treaty of peace in all its fullness, men like these would have to die again to do the work over again and convince provincial statesmen that the world is one and that only by organization of the world can you save the young men of the world.

"As I take up this theme there is a picture very distinct in my mind. Last Memorial Day I stood in an American cemetery in France just outside Paris, on the slopes of Suresnes. The hills slope steeply to a little plain, and when I went out there all the slope of the hill was covered with men in the American uniform, standing, but rising tier on tier as if in a great witness stand. Then below, all over this little level space, were the simple crosses that marked the resting place of American dead. Just by the stand where I spoke was a group of French women who had lost their own sons, but, just because they had lost their own sons and because their hearts went out in thought and sympathy to the mothers on this side of the sea, had made themselves, so to say, mothers of those graves, had every day gone to take care of them, had every day strewn them with flowers. They stood there, their cheeks wetted with tears, while I spoke, not of the French dead but of the American boys who had died in the common cause, and there seemed to me to be drawn together on that day and in that little sunny spot the hearts of the world. I took occasion to say on that day that those who stood in the way of completing the task that those men had died for would some day look back upon it as those have looked back upon the days when they tried to divide this Union and prevent it from being a single Nation united in a single form of liberty. For the completion of the work of those men is this, that the thing that they fought to stop shall never be attempted again.

"I call you to mind that we did not go into this war willingly. I was in a position to know; in the providence of God, the leadership of this Nation was intrusted to me during those early years of the war when we were not in it. I was aware through many subtle channels of the movements of opinion in this country, and I know that the thing that this country chiefly desired, the thing that you men out here in the West chiefly desired and the thing that of course every loving woman had at her heart, was that we should keep out of the war, and we tried to persuade ourselves that the European business was not our business. We tried to convince ourselves that no matter what happened on the other side of the sea, no obligation of duty rested upon us, and finally we found the currents of humanity too strong for us. We found that a great consciousness was welling up in us that this was not a local cause, that this was not a struggle which was to be confined to Europe, or confined to Asia, to which it had spread, but that it was something that involved the very fate of civilization; and there was one great Nation in the world that could not afford to stay out of it. There are gentlemen opposing the ratification of this treaty who at that time taunted the administration of the United States that it had lost touch with its international conscience. They were eager to go in, and now that they have got in, and are caught in the whole network of human conscience, they want to break out and stay out. We were caught in this thing by the action of a nation utterly unlike ourselves. What I mean to say is that the German nation, the German people, had no choice whatever as to whether it was to go into that war or not, did not know that it was going into it until its men were summoned to the colors. I remember, not once but often, sitting at the Cabinet table in Washington, I asked my colleagues what their impression was of the opinion of the country before we went into the war, and I remember one day one of my colleagues said to me, 'Mr. President, I think the people of the country would take your advice and do what you suggested.' 'Why,' I said, 'that is not what I am waiting for; that is not enough. If they can not go in with a whoop, there is no use of their going in at all. I do not want them to wait on me. I am waiting on them. I want to know what the conscience of this country is speaking. I want to know what the purpose is arising in the minds of the people of this country with regard to this world situation.' When I thought I heard that voice, it was then that I proposed to the Congress of the United States that we should include ourselves in the challenge that Germany was giving to mankind.

"We fought Germany in order that there should be a world fit to live in. The world is not fit to live in, my fellow citizens, if any great government is in a position to do what the German Government did—secretly plot a war and begin it with the whole strength of its people, without so much as consulting its own people. A great war can not begin with public deliberation. A great war can begin only by private plot, because the peoples of this world are not asleep, as they used to be. The German people is a great educated people. All the thoughtful men in Germany, so far as I have been able to learn, who were following peaceful pursuits—the bankers and the merchants and the manufacturers—deemed it folly to go into that war. They said so then and they have said so since, but they were not consulted.

The masters of Germany were the general military staff; it was these men who nearly brought a complete cataclysm upon civilization itself. It stands to reason that if we permit anything of that sort to happen again we are recreant to the men we sent across the seas to fight this war. We are deliberately guilty then of preparing a situation which will inevitably lead to what? What shall I call it? The final war? Alas, my fellow citizens, it might be the final arrest, though I pray only the temporary arrest, of civilization itself; and America has, if I may take the liberty of saying so, a greater interest in the prevention of that war than any other nation. America is less exhausted by the recent war than the other belligerents; she is not exhausted at all. America has paid for the war that has gone by less heavily, in proportion to her wealth, than the other nations. America still has free capital enough for its own industries and for the industries of the other countries that have to build their industries anew. The next war would have to be paid for in American blood and American money. The nation of all nations that is most interested to prevent the recurrence of what has already happened is the nation which would assuredly have to bear the brunt of that great catastrophe—either have to bear it or stop where we are. Who is going to check the growth of this Nation? Who is going to check the accumulation of physical power by this Nation—if you choose to put it in that form? Who is going to reduce the natural resources of this country? Who is going to change the circumstance that we largely feed the rest of the world? Who is going to change the circumstance that many of our resources are unique and indispensable? America is going to grow more and more powerful; and the more powerful she is the more inevitable it is that she should be trustee for the peace of the world.

"A miracle has happened. I dare say that many of you have in mind the very short course of American history. You know, when this Nation was born and we were just a little group—3,000,000 people on the Atlantic coast—how the nations on the other side of the water and the statesmen of that day watched us with a certain condescension, looked upon us as a sort of group of hopeful children, pleased for the time being with the conception of absolute freedom and political liberty, far in advance of the other peoples of the world because less experienced than they, less aware of the difficulties of the great task that they had accomplished. As the years have gone by they have watched the growth of this Nation with astonishment and for a long time with dismay. They watched it with dismay until a very interesting and significant thing happened. When we fought Cuba's battle for her, then they said, 'Ah, it is the beginning of what we predicted. She will seize Cuba and, after Cuba, what she pleases to the south of her. It is the beginning of the history we have gone through ourselves.' They ought to have known; they set us the example! When we actually fulfilled to the letter our promise that we would set helpless Cuba up as an independent government and guarantee her independence—when we carried out that great policy we astounded and converted the world. Then began—let me repeat the word again—then began the confidence of the world in America, and I want to testify to you to-night that nothing was more overpowering to me and my colleagues in Paris than the evidences of the absolutely unquestioning confidence of the peoples of the world in the people of America. We were touched by it not only, but I must admit we were frightened by it, because we knew that they were expecting things of us that we could not accomplish; we knew that they were hoping for some miracle of justice which would set them forward the same hundred years that we have traveled on the progress toward free government; and we knew that it was a slow road; we knew that you could not suddenly transform a people from a people of subjects into a people of self-governing units. And I perhaps returned a little bit to my own profession of teaching and tried to point out to them that some of the things they were expecting of us could not be done now; but they refused to be disabused of their absolute confidence that America could and would do anything that was right for the other peoples of the world. An amazing thing! What was more interesting still, my fellow citizens, was this: It happened that America laid down the specifications for the peace. It happened that America proposed the principles upon which the peace with Germany should be built. I use the word 'happened' because I have found, and everybody who has looked into the hearts of some of the people on the other side of the water has found, that the people on the other side of the water, whatever may be said about their Governments, had learned their lesson from America before, and they believed in those principles before we promulgated them; and their statesmen, knowing that their people believed in them, accepted them—accepted them before the American representatives crossed the sea. We found them ready to lay down the foundations of that peace along the lines that America had suggested, and all of Europe was aware that what was being done was building up an American peace. In such circumstances we were under a peculiar compulsion to carry the work to the point which had filled our convictions from the first.

"Where did the suggestion first come from? Where did the idea first spread that there should be a society of nations? It was first suggested and it first spread in the United States, and some gentlemen were the chief proponents of it who are now objecting to the adoption of the covenant of the league of nations. They went further, some of them, than any principles of that covenant goes, and now for some reason which I must admit is inscrutable to me they are opposing the very thing into which they put their heart and their genius. All Europe knew that we were doing an American thing when we put the covenant of the league of nations at the beginning of the treaty, and one of the most interesting things over there was our dealing with some of the most cynical men I had to deal with, and there were some cynics over there—men who believed in what has come to be known as the old Darwinian idea of the survival of the fittest. They said, 'In nature the strong eats up the weak, and in politics the strong overcomes and dominates the weak. It has always been so, and it is always going to be so.' When I first got to Paris they talked about the league of nations indulgently in my presence, politely. I think some of them had the idea, 'Oh, well, we must humor Wilson along so that he will not make a public fuss about it,' and those very men, before our conferences were over, suggested more often than anybody else that some of the most difficult and delicate tasks in carrying out this peace should be left to the league of nations, and they all admitted that the league of nations, which they had deemed an ideal dream, was a demonstrable, practical necessity. This treaty can not be carried out without the league of nations, and I will tell you some interesting cases.

"I have several times said, and perhaps I may say again, that one of the principal things about this treaty is that it establishes the land titles of the world. It says, for example, that Bohemia shall belong to the Bohemians and not to the Austrians or to the Hungarians; that if the Bohemians do not want to live under a monarchy, dual or single, it is their business and not ours, and they can do what they please with their own country. We have said of the Austrian territories south of Austria and Hungary, occupied by the Jugo-Slavs, 'These never did belong to Austria; they always did belong to Slavs, and the Slavs shall have them for their own, and we will guarantee the title.' I have several times asked, 'Suppose that the land titles of a State like Montana were clearly enough stated and somewhere recorded, but that there was no way of enforcing them.' You know what would happen. Every one of you would enforce his own land title. You used to go armed here long ago, and you would resume the habit if there was nobody to guarantee your legal title. You would have to resume the habit. If society is not going to guarantee your titles, you have got to see to it yourselves that others respect them. That was the condition of Europe and will be the condition of Europe again if these settled land titles which have been laid out are not guaranteed by organized society, and the only organized society that can guarantee them is a society of nations.

"It was not easy to draw the line. It was not a surveyor's task. There were not well-known points from which to start and to which to go, because, for example, we were trying to give the Bohemians the lands where the Bohemians lived, but the Bohemians did not stop at a straight line. If they will pardon the expression, they slopped over. And Germans slopped over into Poland and in some places there was an almost inextricable mixture of the two populations. Everybody said that the statistics lied. They said the German statistics with regard to high Silesia, for example, were not true, because the Germans wanted to make it out that the Germans were in a majority there, and the Poles declared that the Poles were in the majority there. We said, 'This is a difficult business. Sitting in Paris we can not tell by count how many Poles there are in high Silesia or how many Germans, and if we could count them, we can not tell from Paris what they want. High Silesia does not belong to us; it does not belong to anybody but the people who lived in it. We will do this: We will put that territory under the care of the league of nations for a little period; we will establish a small armed force there, made up of contingents out of the different allied nations so that no one of them would be in control, and then we will hold a referendum, and high Silesia shall belong either to Germany or to Poland as the people in high Silesia desire.' That is only one case out of half a dozen. In regions where the make-up of the population is doubtful or the desire of the population is as yet unascertained, the league of nations is to be the instrumentality by which the goods are to be delivered to the people to whom they belong. No other international conference ever conceived such a purpose, and no earlier conference of that sort would have been willing to carry out such a purpose. Up to the time of this war, my fellow-citizens, it was the firm and fixed conviction of statesmen in Europe that the greater nations ought to dominate and guide and determine the destiny of the weaker nations, and the American principle was rejected. The American principle is that just as the weak man has the same legal rights that the strong man has, just as the poor man has the same rights as the rich, though, I am sorry to say, he does not always get them, so as between nations the principle of equality is the only principle of justice, and the weak nations have just as many rights and just the same rights as the strong nations. If you do not establish that principle, then this war is going to come again, because this war came by aggression upon a weak nation.

"What happened, my fellow citizens? Don't you remember? The Crown Prince of Austria was assassinated in Serbia. Not assassinated by anybody over whom the Government of Serbia had any control, but assassinated by some man who had at his heart the memory of something that was intolerable to him that had been done to the people that he belonged to, and the Austrian Government, not immediately but by suggestion from Berlin, where it was whispered, 'We are ready for the World War, and this is a good chance to begin it; the other nations do not believe we are going to begin it; we will begin it and overwhelm France, first of all, before the others can come to her rescue.' The Austrian Government sent an ultimatum to Serbia practically demanding of her that she surrender to them her sovereign rights, and gave her 24 hours to decide. Poor Serbia, in her sudden terror, with memory of things that had happened before and might happen again, practically yielded to every demand, and with regard to a little portion of the ultimatum said she would like to talk it over with them, and they did not dare wait. They knew that if the world ever had the facts of that dispute laid before them the opinion of mankind would overwhelm anybody that took aggression against Serbia in such circumstances. The point is that they chose this little nation. They had always chosen the Balkans as the ground of their intrigue. German princes were planted all through the Balkans, so that when Germany got ready she could use the Balkan situation as pawns in her game.

"And what does the treaty of peace do? The treaty of peace sets all those nations up in independence again; gives Serbia back what had been torn away from her, sets up the Jugo-Slavic States and the Bohemian States under the name of Czechoslovakia; and if you leave it at that, you leave those nations just as weak as they were before. By giving them their land titles, you do not make them any stronger. You make them stronger in spirit, it may be, they see a new day, they feel a new enthusiasm, their old love of their country can now express itself in action, but physically they are no stronger than they were before, and that road that we heard so much of—from Bremen to Bagdad—is wide open. The Germans were traveling that road. Their general staff interrupted the game. The merchants and manufacturers and bankers of Germany were making conquest of the world. All they had to do was to wait a little while longer, and long German fingers would have been stretched all through that country which never could have been withdrawn. The war spoiled the game. German intrigue was penetrating all those countries and controlling them. The dirty center of the intrigue, dirty in every respect, was Constantinople, and from there ramified all the threads that made this web, in the center of which was the venomous spider. If you leave that road open, if you leave those nations to take care of themselves, knowing that they can not take care of themselves, then you have committed the unpardonable sin of undoing the victory which our boys won. You say, 'What have we got to do with it?' Let us answer that question, and not from a sentimental point of view at all. Suppose we did not have any hearts under our jackets. Suppose we did not care for these people. Care for them? Why, their kinsmen are everywhere in the communities of the United States, people who love people over there are everywhere in the United States. We are made up out of mankind; we can not tear our hearts away from them. Our hearts are theirs, but suppose they were not. Suppose we had forgotten everything except the material, commercial, monetary interests of the United States. You can not get those markets away from Germany if you let her reestablish her old influence there. The 300,000,000 people between the Rhine and the Ural Mountains will be in such a condition that they can not buy anything, their industries can not start, unless they surrender themselves to the bankers of Mittel-Europa, that you used to hear about; and the peoples of Italy and France and Belgium, some 80,000,000 strong, who are your natural customers, can not buy anything in disturbed and bankrupt Europe. If you are going to trade with them, you have got to go partners with them.

"When I hear gentlemen talk about America standing for herself, I wonder where they have been living. Has America disconnected herself from the rest of the world? Her ambition has been to connect herself with all the rest of the world commercially, and she is bankrupt unless she does. Look at the actual situation right now, my fellow citizens. The war was a very great stimulation to some of the greatest of the manufacturing industries of this country, and a very interesting thing has been going on. You remember, some of you perhaps painfully remember, that the Congress of the United States put a very heavy tax on excess profits, and a great many men who were making large excess profits said, 'All right, we can manage this. These will not be profits; we will spend these in enlarging our plants, advertising, increasing our facilities, spreading our agencies.' They have got ready for a bigger business than they can do unless they have the world to do it in, and if they have not the world to do it in, there will be a recession of prosperity in this country; there will be unemployment; there will be bankruptcy in some cases. The giant is so big that he will burst his jacket. The rest of the world is necessary to us, if you want to put it on that basis. I do not like to put it on that basis. That is not the American basis. America does not want to feed upon the rest of the world. She wants to feed it and serve it. America, if I may say it without offense to great peoples for whom I have a profound admiration on the other side of the water, is the only national idealistic force in the world, and idealism is going to save the world. Selfishness will embroil it. Narrow selfishness will tie things up into urgly knots that you can not get open except with a sword. All the human passions, if aroused on the wrong side, will do the world an eternal disservice.

"I remember somebody said to me one day, using a familiar phrase, that this was an age in which mind was monarch, and my reply was, 'Well, if that is true, mind is one of those modern monarchs that reign and do not govern; as a matter of fact, we are governed by a great popular assembly made up of the passions, and the best that we can manage is that the handsome passions shall be in the majority.' That is the task of mankind, that the handsome passions, the handsome sentiments, the handsome purposes, shall always have a dominating and working majority, so that they will always be able to outvote the baser passions, to defeat all the cupidities and meannesses and criminalities of the world. That is the program of civilization. The basis of the program of civilization, I want to say with all the emphasis that I am capable of, is Christian and not pagan, and in the presence of this inevitable partnership with the rest of the world, these gentlemen say, 'We will not sign the articles of copartnership.' Well, why not? You have heard, I dare say, only about four things in the covenant of the league of nations. I have not heard them talk about anything else. It is a very wonderful document and you would think there were only four things in it. The things that they talk about are the chance to get out, the dangers of article 10, the Monroe doctrine, and the risk that other nations may interfere in our domestic affairs. Those are the things that keep them awake at night, and I want very briefly to take those things in their sequence.

"I do not like to discuss some of them. If I go to do a thing, I do not say at the beginning, 'My chief interest in this thing is how I am going to get out.' I will not be a very trusted or revered partner if it is evident that my fear is that I will continue to be a partner. But we will take that risk. We will sit by the door with our hand on the knob, and sit on the edge of our chair. There is nothing in the covenant to prevent our going out whenever we please, with the single limitation that we give two years' notice. The gentlemen who discuss this thing do not object to the two years' notice; they say, 'It says that you can get out after two years' notice if at that time you have fulfilled your international obligations,' and they are afraid somebody will have the right to say that they have not. That right can not belong to anybody unless you give it to somebody, and the covenant of the league does not give it to anybody. It is absolutely left to the conscience of this Nation, as to the conscience of every other member of the league, to determine whether at the time of its withdrawal it has fulfilled its international obligations or not; and inasmuch as the United States always has fulfilled its international obligations, I wonder what these gentlemen are afraid of! There is only one thing to restrain us from getting out, and that is the opinion of our fellow men, and that will not restrain us in any conceivable circumstance if we have followed the honorable course which we always have followed. I would be ashamed as an American to be afraid that when we wanted to get out we should not have fulfilled our international obligations.

"Then comes article 10, for I am taking the questions in the order in which they come in the covenant itself. Let me repeat to you article 10 nearly verbatim; I am not trying to repeat it exactly as it is written in the covenant. Every member of the league agrees to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the other members of the league. There is the guarantee of the land titles. Without that clause, there is no guarantee of the land titles. Without that clause the heart of the recent war is not cut out. The heart of the recent war was an absolute disregard of the territorial integrity and political independence of the smaller nations. If you do not cut the heart of the war out, that heart is going to live and beat and grow stronger, and we will have the cataclysm again. Then the article adds that it shall be the duty of the council of the league to advise the members of the league what steps may be necessary from time to time to carry out this agreement; to advise, not to direct. The Congress of the United States is just as free under that article to refuse to declare war as it is now; and it is very much safer than it is now. The opinion of the world and of the United States bade it to declare war in April, 1917. It would have been shamed before all mankind if it had not declared war then. It was not given audible advice by anybody but its own people, but it knew that the whole world was waiting for it to fulfill a manifest moral obligation. This advice can not be given, my fellow citizens, without the vote of the United States. The advice can not be given without a unanimous vote of the council of the league. The member of the council representing the United States has to vote aye before the United States or any other country can be advised to go to war under that agreement, unless the United States is herself a party. What does that mean? Unless the United States is going to seize somebody else's territory or somebody else is going to seize the territory of the United States. I do not contemplate it as a likely contingency that we are going to steal somebody else's territory, I dismiss that as not a serious probability, and I do not see anybody within reach who is going to take any of ours. But suppose we should turn highwayman, or that some other nation should turn highwayman, and stretch its hands out for what belongs to us. Then what difference does it make what advice the council gives? We are in the scrap anyhow. In those circumstances Congress is not going to wait to hear what the council of the league says to determine whether it is going to war or not. The war will be its war. So that any way you turn article 10 it does not alter in the least degree the freedom and independence of the United States with regard to its action in respect of war. All of that is stated in such plain language that I can not for the life of me understand how anybody reads it any other way. I know perfectly well that the men who wrote it read it the way I am interpreting it. I know that it is intended to be written that way, and if I am any judge of the English language, they succeeded in writing it that way.

"Then they are anxious about the Monroe doctrine. The covenant says in so many words that nothing in that document shall be taken as invalidating the Monroe doctrine. I do not see what more you could say. While the matter was under debate in what was called the commission on the league of nations, the body that drew the covenant up, in which were representatives of 14 nations, I tried to think of some other language that could state it more unqualifiedly, and I could not think of any other. Can you? Nothing in that document should be taken as invalidating the Monroe doctrine—I can not say it any plainer than that—and yet by a peculiar particularity of anxiety these gentlemen can not believe their eyes; and from one point of view it is not strange, my fellow citizens. The rest of the world always looked askance on the Monroe doctrine. It is true, though some people have forgotten it, that President Monroe uttered that doctrine at the suggestion of the British cabinet, and in its initiation, in its birth, it came from Mr. Canning, who was prime minister of England and who wanted the aid of the United States in checking the ambition of some of the European countries to establish their power in South America. Notwithstanding that, Great Britain did not like the Monroe doctrine as we grew so big. It was one thing to have our assistance and another thing for us not to need her assistance. And the rest of the world had studiously avoided on all sorts of interesting occasions anything that could be interpreted as an acknowledgment of the Monroe doctrine. So I am not altogether surprised that these gentlemen can not believe their eyes. Here the nations of Europe say that they are entering into an arrangement no part of which shall be interpreted as invalidating the Monroe doctrine. I do not have to say anything more about that. To my mind, that is eminently satisfactory, and as long as I am President I shall feel an added freedom in applying, when I think fit, the Monroe doctrine. I am very much interested in it, and I foresee occasions when it might be appropriately applied.

"In the next place they are afraid that other nations will interfere in our domestic questions. There, again, the covenant of the league distinctly says that if any dispute arises which is found to relate to an exclusively domestic question, the council shall take no action with regard to it and make no report concerning it, and the questions that these gentlemen most often mention, namely, the questions of the tariff and of immigration and of naturalization, are acknowledged by every authoritative student of international law without exception to be as, of course, domestic questions. These gentlemen want us to make an obvious thing painfully obvious by making a list of the domestic questions, and I object to making the list for this very reason, that if you make a list you may leave something out. I remind all students of law within the sound of my voice of the old principle of the law that the mention of one thing is the exclusion of other things; that if you meant everything, you ought to have said everything; that if you said a few things, you did not have the rest in mind. I object to making a list of domestic questions, because a domestic question may come up which I did not think of. In every such case the United States would be just as secure in her independent handling of the question as she is now.

"Then, outside the covenant is the question of Shantung. Some gentlemen want to make a reservation or something that they clothe with a handsome name with regard to the Shantung provision, which is that the rights which Germany illicitly got, for she got it by duress, from China shall pass to Japan. While the war was in progress, Great Britain and France expressly, in a written treaty, though a secret treaty, entered into an engagement with Japan that she should have all that Germany had in the Province of Shantung. If we repudiate this treaty in that matter Great Britain and France can not repudiate the other treaty, and they can not repudiate this treaty inasmuch as it confirms the other. Therefore, in order to take away from Japan, for she is in physical possession of it now, what Germany had in China, we shall have to fight Japan and Great Britain and France; and at the same time do China no service, because one of the things that is known to everybody is that when the United States consented, because of this promise of Great Britain and France, to putting that provision in the treaty, Japan agreed that she would not take all of what was given to her in the treaty; that, on the contrary, she would, just as soon as possible after the treaty was carried out, return every sovereign right or right resembling a sovereign right that Germany had enjoyed in Shantung to the Government of China, and that she would retain at Shantung only those economic rights with regard to the administration of the railway and the exploitation of certain mines that other countries enjoy elsewhere in China. It is not an exceptional arrangement—a very unfortunate arrangement, I think, elsewhere as there, for China, but not an exceptional arrangement. Under it Japan will enjoy privileges exactly similar and concessions exactly similar to what other nations enjoy elsewhere in China and nothing more. In addition to that, if the treaty is entered into by the United States China will for the first time in her history have a forum to which to bring every wrong that is intended against her or that has been committed against her.

"When you are studying article 10, my fellow citizens, I beg of you that you will read article 11. I do not hear that very often referred to. Article 11—I am not going to quote the words of it—makes it the right of any member of the league to call attention to anything, anywhere, that is likely to disturb the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations upon which the peace of the world depends. Every aspiring people, every oppressed people, every people whose hearts can no longer stand the strain of the tyranny that has been put upon them, can find a champion to speak for it in the forum of the world. Until that covenant is adopted, what is the international law? International law is that no matter how deeply the United States is interested in something in some other part of the world that she believes is going to set the world on fire or disturb the friendly relations between two great nations, she can not speak of it unless she can show that her own interests are directly involved. It is a hostile and unfriendly act to call attention to it, and article 11 says, in so many words, that it shall be the friendly right of every nation to call attention to any such matter anywhere; so that if anybody contemplates anything that is an encroachment upon the rights of China he can be summoned to the bar of the world. I do not know when any nation that could not take care of itself, as unfortunately China can not, ever had such a humane advantage accorded it before. It is not only we, my fellow citizens, who are caught in all the implications of the affairs of the world; everybody is caught in it now, and it is right that anything that affects the world should be made everybody's business.

"The heart of the covenant of the league of nations is this: Every member of the league promises never to go to war without first having done one or the other of two things, either having submitted the matter to arbitration, in which case it agrees absolutely to abide by the award, or having submitted it to discussion by the council of the league of nations. If it submits it for discussion by the council, it agrees to allow six months for the discussion and to lay all the documents and facts in its possession before the council, which is authorized to publish them; and even if it is not satisfied with the opinion rendered by the council, it agrees that it will not go to war within less than three months after the publication of that judgment. There are nine months in which the whole matter is before the bar of mankind, and, my fellow citizens, I make this confident prediction, that no nation will dare submit a bad case to that jury. I believe that this covenant is better than 95 per cent insurance against war. Suppose it was only 5 per cent insurance; would not you want it? If you can get any insurance against war, do not you want it? I ask any mother, any father, any brother, anybody with a heart, 'Do not you want some insurance against war, no matter how little?' And the experience of mankind, from the conferences between employers and employees, is that if people get together and talk things over, it becomes more and more difficult to fight the longer they talk. There is not any subject that has not two sides to it, and the reason most men will not enter into discussion with antagonists is that they are afraid the other fellows' side will be stronger than theirs. The only thing you are afraid of, my fellow citizens, is the truth.

"A cynical old politician once said to his son, 'John, do not bother your head about lies; they will take care of themselves, but if you ever hear me denying anything you may make up your mind it is so.' The only thing that is formidable is the truth. I learned what I know about Mexico, which is not as much as I should desire, by hearing a large number of liars tell me all about it. At first, I was very much confused, because the narratives did not tally, and then one day, when I had a lucid interval, it occurred to me that that was because what was told me was not true. The truth always matches; it is lies that do not match. I also observed that back of all these confusing contradictions there was a general mass of facts which they all stated, and I knew that that was the region into which their lying capacity did not extend. They had not had time to make up any lies about that, and the correspondences in their narratives constituted the truth. The differences could be forgotten. So I learned a great deal about Mexico by listening to a sufficiently large number of liars. The truth is the regnant and triumphant thing in this world. You may trample it under foot, you may blind its eyes with blood, but you can not kill it, and sooner or later it rises up and seeks and gets its revenge.

"That is what it behooves us to remember, my fellow citizens, in these radical days. The men who want to cure the wrongs of governments by destroying government are going to be destroyed themselves; destroyed, I mean, by the chaos that they have created, because remove the organism of society and, even if you are strong enough to take anything that you want, you are not smart enough to keep it. The next stronger fellow will take it away from you and the most audacious group amongst you will make slaves and tools of you. That is the truth that is going to master society in Russia and in any other place that tries Russia's unhappy example. I hope you will not think it inappropriate if I stop here to express my shame as an American citizen at the race riots that have occurred in some places in this country where men have forgotten humanity and justice and ordered society and have run amuck. That constitutes a man not only the enemy of society but his own enemy and the enemy of justice. I want to say this, too, that a strike of the policemen of a great city, leaving that city at the mercy of an army of thugs, is a crime against civilization. In my judgment, the obligation of a policeman is as sacred and direct as the obligation of a soldier. He is a public servant, not a private employee, and the whole honor and safety of the community is in his hands. He has no right to prefer any private advantage to the public safety. I hope that that lesson will be burned in so that it will never again be forgotten, because the pride of America is that it can exercise self-control. That is what a self-governing nation is, not merely a nation that elects people to do its jobs for it, but a nation that can keep its head, concert its purposes, and find out how its purposes can be executed.

"One of the noblest sentences ever uttered was uttered by Mr. Garfield before he became President. He was a Member of Congress, as I remember it, at the time of Mr. Lincoln's assassination. He happened to be in New York City, and Madison Square was filled with a surging mass of deeply excited people when the news of the murder came. Mr. Garfield was at the old Fifth Avenue Hotel, which had a balcony out over the entrance, and they begged him to go out and say something to the people. He went out and, after he had attracted their attention, he said this beautiful thing: 'My fellow citizens, the President is dead, but the Government lives and God Omnipotent reigns.' America is the place where you can not kill your government by killing the men who conduct it. The only way you can kill government in America is by making the men and women of America forget how to govern, and nobody can do that. They sometimes find the team a little difficult to drive, but they sooner or later whip it into harness. And, my fellow citizens, the underlying thought of what I have tried to say to you to-night is the organization of the world for order and peace. Our fortunes are directly involved, and my mind reverts to that scene that I painted for you at the outset—that slope at Suresnes, those voiceless graves, those weeping women—and I say, 'My fellow citizens, the pledge that speaks from those graves is demanded of us. We must see to it that those boys did not die in vain. We must fulfill the great mission upon which they crossed the sea.'"

YUMA IRRIGATION PROJECT, ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration and passage of a bill which I am sure will be unobjectionable. It is important that it be passed at an early day. It provides for the disposition of the waste and drainage water at the end of the Yuma irrigation project in Arizona. We desire to have the advantage of the use of this water on the American side, but have at present no power to use it. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2610) to provide for the disposal of certain waste and drainage water from the Yuma project, Arizona.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to dispose of the waste and drainage waters which are or may become available at the southern end of the Yuma reclamation project, Arizona, which was constructed under the provisions of the reclamation act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat., p. 388), on the best terms obtainable without incurring any obligation for delivery of any specific quantity of water at any future time.

SEC. 2. That the proceeds of the disposal of said waters shall be covered into the reclamation fund and be employed in defraying the expenses incident to the delivery of such water, including pumping and river protection, and the balance, if any, is hereby appropriated, and shall be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior for improving and maintaining the river protection works of the Yuma project.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF OFFICERS IN COAST GUARD.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 102) to equalize the pay and allowances of commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Coast Guard with those of the Navy. I ask leave to make a brief statement as to what the joint resolution relates.

The joint resolution proposes legislation relative to the pay and allowances of officers of the Coast Guard Service. The Coast Guard is composed of the old Revenue Service and the Life-Saving Service. During the war they were attached to the Navy Department, and received the pay and allowances which were received in the Navy. They have, however, since been detached from the Navy Department, which relegates them to the scale of wages that prevailed before the war. The department now finds difficulty in obtaining crews for that service at the present pay. Men are leaving the service because they can get higher wages in other sea service.

It is very important that the joint resolution should pass promptly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. I ask that the joint resolution be read, because, if I understand its terms and provisions, I shall object to its consideration.

The Secretary proceeded to read the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. I will not ask to have the joint resolution read further. I object to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

CONFIRMATION OF CAPT. WILLIAM EDWARD REYNOLDS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, on yesterday, when the executive session was held, I could not be present. I had been previously called away from the Senate. I have had in my desk for some time a nomination to report favorably. I ask unanimous consent that, as in executive session, I may now be permitted to report the nomination referred to, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the report.

The SECRETARY. From the Committee on Commerce Mr. JONES of Washington reports favorably the nomination of Senior Capt. William Edward Reynolds to be captain commandant of the Coast Guard to fill an existing vacancy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the confirmation of the nomination?

The Chair hears none, and the nomination is confirmed, and the President will be notified.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I could hope to record accurately my views with respect to the German treaty in the votes I shall cast during its consideration by the Senate, I would not add to the already tremendous volume of discussion; but all of us know through long experience how impossible it is to express through parliamentary forms our exact opinions upon an intricate and difficult subject, and this situation constrains me to do what otherwise I would gladly have left undone.

Strange as it may seem, I intend to assume that every Senator, whether he is for the treaty or against the treaty, whether he is for the league of nations or against the league of nations, whether he demands reservations or is opposed to reservations, is sincere and honest in his beliefs; that every Senator is a patriot and wants to do the thing with respect to this matter which will most effectually promote the welfare of his country and the interests of humanity. The whirlwind of accusations impliedly, if not expressly, impugning the motives of Senators has been exceedingly painful to those of us who still believe in the integrity of the Senate; and its effect upon the people who are earnestly endeavoring to preserve some degree of confidence in this tribunal has been most demoralizing and distressing. It is to be deeply regretted that some Senators feel themselves at liberty to charge other Senators with the base though unbelievable purpose of opposing the treaty simply to discredit the President and to accomplish their political designs. It is equally to be regretted that some Senators feel themselves at liberty to challenge the patriotism and Americanism of their associates and to impute to those who are supporting the President indifference, if not hostility, toward the vital concerns of their own country. Down in their hearts the Senators from Nebraska, Mississippi, Arkansas, Montana, Ohio, and Nevada, who are the powerful advocates of an unqualified ratification of the treaty, can have no doubt that the Senators from Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Idaho, California, and New Mexico are just as devotedly attached to the maintenance of the national honor in the association with our allies to the lofty sentiments of peace and the welfare of the world as it is possible for men to be. On the other hand, the Senators I have last named do not, can not, question that the group I first named are as strongly wedded to American institutions and the perpetuation of our national independence as mortals can become.

Nevertheless a casual observer in the Senate would be inclined to reach the conclusion that the most influential Senators upon this side of the Chamber are altogether insensible to the awful horrors of war and are determined to keep the world in conflict simply to antagonize the President or to work out some petty ambition for party supremacy, while at the same time he could not well resist the inference that the most persuasive Senators upon the other side of the Chamber are bent on wrecking their own country simply to vindicate the infallibility of the Chief Executive in his work at Paris. Nothing could be more unfortunate than the impression which such a situation creates in the country. The unhappy consequences are not limited to the treaty under consideration, but extend to all the subjects of legislation, for how dare we expect that the people will be law-abiding if they believe that the lawmakers are neither sincere in their purposes nor honest in their legislation? If little by little we destroy the faith of the masses of the people in the integrity of representative government, we will ourselves be chiefly responsible for the greatest calamity which can befall the human race.

It ought not to excite surprise to find the widest differences of opinion with respect to policies and measures which should be adopted in both our domestic and foreign affairs, but I appeal with all my strength for a course of debate which proceeds upon the assumption that all of us are mindful of our constitutional obligations and that each of us in his own way is endeavoring to advance the interests of the people of the United States with single-minded fidelity.

It was inexpressibly shocking to me to read in the newspapers a few days ago that the President had characterized Senators who are opposed to the treaty as "contemptible quitters," and that he had sent to them the message, "Put up or shut up." I will not believe until these reports are corroborated that the Chief Executive of the Nation ever used these or similar expressions, but if he did he has lost something which, try as he may, he will never regain—something indispensable to the successful conduct of the high office which he now occupies. I can understand his tremendous anxiety for the approval of his work, but he ought to understand, and presently he will understand, that such epithets and such coarse and brutal threats will not advance his cause in the Senate, and will—and this is the deplorable reflection—inevitably tend to overthrow the institutions he has sworn to protect and preserve. The German treaty is vastly important, but it shrinks into nothingness when compared with the defense of law and order, with the maintenance of peace and security within our own borders. With these preliminary observations, which, trite and obvious as they are, I could not refrain from making, I turn to the subject under our immediate consideration.

It is not my purpose to review analytically that part of the treaty which relates to the terms imposed upon Germany. It is my opinion that in some respects these terms are not as severe as they should be, and that in other respects they are more severe than they ought to be. It has been my view that Germany should be made helpless or harmless in a military way and left as free as is consistent with safety in a commercial and industrial way, in order that she might be able to make the reparations and restitutions which in justice she ought to make. I fear that the German people may not be able to maintain a continuous, successful government under the conditions which have been imposed; and if she fails in that respect she will be a plague spot in the world and the hope of reparations will vanish in the chaos that must ensue. This is, however, an abstract suggestion purely; for, whatever may be my opinion upon the subject, these terms have been agreed upon by Great Britain, France, and Italy, the chief sufferers of the war, and, from my standpoint, the United States should be content with the disposition which these powers have made of the matter.

The one great, irremediable error which our country has committed was made when the President outlined, in his now famous message, the terms of peace. However exalted his purpose may have been, he embarrassed beyond measure the three nations most directly concerned and planted the seeds of dissension and discontent everywhere. For years and years to come this country will feel the weight of that crowning mistake of overpowering egotism. This observation leads me to consider for a moment our attitude toward the war, the end which we sought to accomplish, and the responsibilities which its victorious conclusion imposed upon us. It seems to me absurd to iterate and reiterate that America entered the war to "make the world safe for democracy" or that any other belligerent took up arms in order to bring about that happy result. If democracy is to be accepted as a broad, general synonym for free government, it necessarily implies that the people who compose the government are to come together with or without the struggle which ordinarily precedes the establishment of an independent nation, of their own volition, and rule according to their own will. Not only so, but it involves the thought that an already established power will not oppose the withdrawal from it of a body of men who, by reason of race, color, religion, community of purpose, or other circumstance, desire to do so. There was no nation engaged in the war which fought for any such thing, nor is there a nation in the world that would permit the application of this glittering generality and meaningless catchword to its own affairs. The constant use of this deceptive cry has done infinite harm, and at this moment is beclouding the real issues of an appalling situation.

Our entrance into the conflict was simply an acceptance of a brutal challenge which Germany insolently issued to our honor and interest. We raised an Army, mobilized our Navy, and began to fight, because Germany was already making war upon us, and we knew that if she overcame Europe our country would be in the gravest peril. Under these circumstances it was perfectly clear that we must fight and that we must fight in France. We had just one object, and no soldier or sailor ever misunderstood it: It was to whip Germany and reduce that criminal nation to a state of military helplessness and thus forever remove the peril which threatened to overcome us. When we accomplished that object, our part in the cruel drama was played, and our exit from the stage of war should have been as speedy and complete as possible. This does not mean that we should have abandoned our allies or that we ought to have made a separate peace with Germany; but it does mean that it was not our duty to associate ourselves with foreign powers in reforming the map of the world and in agreeing to maintain it as the victors had made it. We were bound to join Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan in whatever measures were necessary to be taken to make it sure that Germany would not again assault the world, and, plainly, the American people must bear the burden, whatever it may be, of enforcing such terms upon Germany that she will not again become a menace to the safety of the United States. I have not the least sympathy with the suggestion that the moment Germany was overcome upon the field of battle we should have incontinently left Europe and returned to America. We were under the highest obligations of honor, as well as under the most imperative duty to our country, to join our allies in making peace.

It is not true, however, that we are bound to join our associates in arms in every undertaking which they may think necessary in order to compose Europe. The circumstances clearly point out the duty which falls upon us and the duty which falls upon them. Our duty is limited to Germany and her future; their duty expands into whatever concerns their relations with the nations of that continent.

The United States during the last three years has twice entered Europe. It first entered to make war upon Germany, and it was the most impressive spectacle in the history of the world, for it was done in a way and to a degree never before witnessed and which no other power in all the annals of mankind had ever or could ever have paralleled. A little more than a year later, with courage never surpassed, the United States had accomplished its mission; and, when the day of the armistice dawned, it had won the admiration and held the confidence, esteem, and affection of every country of the earth whose people loved justice, revered liberty, and honored manhood. The name and fame of the American soldier and the nation of his allegiance touched the highest point ever attained in the cause of humanity.

A little later the United States again entered Europe; this time not to make war, but to make peace. A great ship was chartered and filled with statesmen of high and low degree, with historians, students, lawyers, experts, and a vast retinue of attendants, and at their head the President of the United States in royal state and ceremonial accompaniment. He had prepared and published his program, and he went like a victorious conqueror—not of Germany alone, but of all the problems of organized and unorganized society—to carry into effect his extraordinary plan for the reformation and the readjustment of all of the peoples of the whole earth. If we may credit the manifestos which preceded him, he went to make everybody happy, comfortable, and prosperous; he went to insure to every human being the highest forms of civilization and the completest freedom known to mankind; he went to appeal, if necessary, to the citizens of the allied countries against the injustice of their own institutions; he went to impose upon America, as the one power of undiminished strength and resources, the task of settling all disputes and imposing her will upon vast populations naturally turbulent and disordered by war.

This he was pleased to call the highest duty of the people of the United States. He remained six months and, in some fashion, ended his work. When he came away the United States had not a friend in Europe, Asia, or Africa, and our brilliant service in the war was almost forgotten in the storm of protests which followed him as he sailed for home. The one thing he brought with him which was joyfully received in America by multitudes of good people was the covenant for a league of nations, and this because, and only because, these people believed, many of them without inquiry, that the league would bring peace to a war-weary world and would maintain it in all the years to come. Gradually these people are beginning to see the tremendous and, indeed, impossibly heavy burdens we are asked to assume, and gradually they are understanding that there are some provisions in the covenant which must inevitably provoke war instead of keeping the peace. Gradually they are being convinced that the United States can not, with safety to its own men and women, guarantee with our Army and Navy the sovereignty of all the nations as they may emerge from the clouds of the titanic struggle through which we have passed.

It seems to me that a due regard for the interests and honor of the United States would have required this concourse of American representatives who filled the George Washington to overflowing to have said to the assembled peace commissioners something like this:

"America has helped as best it could to win the war, and we are here to join you in a peace with Germany that will render her powerless to assault again her sister nations, and that will leave her without hope of future conquest. So far as we are concerned, this ought to be done by disbanding her army and forbidding its recreation; by destroying her navy and prohibiting its reconstruction; by dismantling her fortifications and preventing their restoration; by turning her munition factories into industrial plants and enjoining their reconversion. We recognize that we ought to share the burden of doing these things for your safety as well as our own.

"We are not here, however, and will not stay here, for the purpose of dividing the territory of Germany among the victorious belligerents. We are not here, and we will not stay here, to assist you in bringing about order in Russia, or of establishing the kind of government which you think ought to prevail in that distracted country. We are not here, and we will not stay here, to aid you in determining whether or not Esthonia, Livonia, Lithuania, Poland, Czechslovakia, Ukraine, Armenia, Hungary, Jugo-Slavia, Roumania, Bulgaria, and Turkey should be independent sovereignties or to maintain their respective territories by force of American arms and the support of the American Treasury. If new boundaries are to be decreed; if plebiscites and elections are to be held; if backward peoples are to be trusteed; if races are to be assigned to this or that power, these are things which belong to you, and the United States, 3,000 miles across the sea, will not become the arbiter or policeman for Europe, Asia, or Africa.

"We are here, and will stay here, to create a compact among nations for peace. We will agree for ourselves that we will submit to the judgment of a world tribunal every arbitrable dispute which may arise between the United States and any other nation, and we will abide by the judgment that may be rendered; not only so, but we will agree that on account of any controversy, whether justiciable or otherwise, we will not go to war for such a period as will enable the reputable nations of the earth to meet in council and hear a full, free discussion of the matter in issue, and a frank interchange of opinion with regard to it, with the understanding that upon such questions the whole province of the council ends with discussion, and that neither decision nor recommendation is to be attempted. We will join you in an honest effort to enlarge and make certain the code of international law so that every nation may know its rights and act accordingly."

It is my deliberate conclusion that if a course the outline of which I have suggested had been pursued this country would still enjoy the respect and confidence of the world, and that everything that mortal wisdom and foresight can do to prevent war would have been done. I ought to add to this thought another which is uppermost in my mind, although I know that it would not have been accepted by the powers associated with us during the war. We ought to have proposed simultaneous and progressive disarmament, for it is my profound belief that the most effective way to prevent wars of great magnitude and general destruction lies in the policy of an unarmed world. I have indicated what I think should have been done, and it will be my purpose as we pass through this treaty to make it conform as nearly as may be, and so far as the United States is involved, to the principles I have attempted to make clear.

Emphatically as I may condemn the disposition of the Chinese Province, or as radically wrong as the distribution of other German territory may be, as indefensible as the delimitation of the borders of these new governments set up in Europe is, or as surcharged with trouble as many of these activities undoubtedly are, I am not willing to disturb these various arrangements between Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. The underlying principle which I am advocating is the withdrawal of interference on our part in these affairs. All that I want to do is to lift the United States from this awful tangle. My whole purpose will have been achieved if I can do something toward delivering our country from this body of death to which we have been chained. I want to relieve the American Republic from the eternal odium of the Shantung crime; I want to relieve it from the responsibility of the government of the Saar Valley, with its plebiscites and autocratic power; I want it relieved from the supervision of the elections in Silesia; I want it relieved from the disgrace of passing over Thrace to Bulgaria; I want it relieved from the everlasting quarrels which will ensue when statesmen and surveyors begin to erect the monuments which will mark the boundaries of the violent peoples in eastern and southern Europe. I want to leave all these and kindred things for disposition by the other belligerents in any way which to them may seem conscionable and humane. The United States can not in justice to its own citizens undertake the responsibility of such an arrangement.

With these observations upon the German treaty proper, I turn for a brief consideration of the covenant for a league of nations. During the closing days of the last session, after the President had returned from Europe with the proposed constitution for a league of nations, I addressed the Senate upon the subject, giving my views with some fullness upon it. I was one of the first, I think, to submit the proposal to a somewhat critical examination. I attempted to state fairly the good that was in it and to point out with such clearness as I could its objectionable provisions. I am not concerned about consistency, for if one speaks the truth as he sees it he need not trouble himself about the harmony of his utterances. It is with some gratification, however, that I find the opinions I now entertain after six months of diligent study and constant reflection are in exact accord with the opinions I then expressed. The intervening period, with its opportunities for examination and reexamination, has but crystallized and deepened the convictions which were then, in a measure, instinctive. In order that others may know that the influence of these months of reflection has brought no change in my opinion, I ask leave to print as an appendix to my present observations the address which I delivered in the Senate on the "Proposed constitution for a league of nations" on the 26th day of February, 1919.

I said then, and I say now, that I am in favor of a league among nations to promote the peaceful settlement of disputes and to prevent war, and the provisions in what was then called a "constitution," but is now described as a "covenant," which look toward the submission of all arbitrable controversies to either arbitration or the judgment of a world court I want to preserve, and I intend to do it if it be possible to disengage it from the evil obligations which other provisions seek to impose upon us. I am earnestly in favor of a world council before which all disputes can be frankly debated before war ensues. I am profoundly convinced that the opportunity which will permit the reputable powers of the earth to meet each other face to face and talk over controversies, pending war, would do more to insure peace among nations than all the obligations which Governments can assume. I am most willing that the United States shall agree that it will not begin a war until it has met its fellow nations in this spirit and made known the causes which seem to lead toward an armed conflict. I am now, as I always have been, for simultaneous and proportionate disarmament proceeding in a progressive way, as confidence grows and fear of war disappears, until we realize our hope in an unarmed world.

These things are not found in full perfection, some of them not at all, in either the proposed "constitution" which the President laid before us last spring nor in the proposed "covenant" which appears as a part of the German treaty, but the beginnings are there and I want to hold fast to them; and I will hold fast to them if I am not asked to ratify certain other articles and clauses in the covenant which are so fatal to free institutions, so subversive of morals in enlightened government, so destructive of American liberty, and so perilous for democracy that I would hold myself a traitor not only to the welfare of our own people but to civilization as well if I did not do everything in my power to eliminate them from the compact, and, failing in that, to refuse my assent to the treaty of which they form a part. In all my life I have never seen good and evil so closely associated and upon such intimate terms as they are in the instrument before us.

In my former address I made three chief objections to the then proposed "constitution for a league of nations": First, to the power given to the league over our domestic questions, including the Monroe doctrine; second, to the obligation to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the nations entering the league; and, third, to the authority of the league for the issuance of a mandate requiring the United States to administer the affairs of a foreign country. There were other but, from my standpoint, minor objections which I did not discuss. The present treaty with its covenant, although changed in its phraseology, intensifies my first objection. The second, based upon article 10, remains unchanged. The third, relating to mandates, has been partially met by the stipulation that any nation selected as a mandatory may accept or decline the proposal. This mitigates the enormity of the mandatory provision, and if it is still further safeguarded by a reservation that Congress alone has the jurisdiction to accept so extraordinary a commission, I can waive my objection, for it is quite impossible for me to conceive that a Congress can be assembled so unmindful of its constitutional limitations and so indifferent to the welfare of the people of the United States as to enter upon any such insane undertaking.

With respect to the jurisdiction of the league, whether in council or assembly, over the domestic affairs of the parties to the covenant and with respect to the exemption of the Monroe doctrine from its authority or interference there seems to be little difference of opinion in principle among Senators. However, we separate widely upon interpretations, and the mere fact that we do differ makes it perfectly clear that there should be a plain, strong, effective reservation upon these subjects in the resolution of ratification; and, without dwelling upon such matters further, I intend to assume that such a reservation will be adopted by a decisive majority.

I approach now, Mr. President, article 10, which, as I have remarked, has been modified only in form but not in substance. It has been often quoted, but I beg to repeat it:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

The President has frequently described this article as the heart of the league, and when we remember the kind of league—the superstate—which lies deep down in his mind, the accuracy of his description can not be questioned. It is this article which was in his vision when he said that there was force in the covenant—in the background, to be sure, but easily perceived. It is this article from which springs his vision of America leading the world. It is in this article that he finds the power to crush all humanity into an artificial, hardened, and eternal pattern. It is upon this article that he bases his hope and prophecy that the conclusion of the treaty will bring peace and quiet, still the raging passions of man, overflow resentment and disappointment with oblivion, stimulate commerce, and create comfort, content, and happiness everywhere.

Far be it from me to doubt the sincerity of the President as he eloquently urges these and kindred considerations. My divergence from his path of reason comes about because I have an entirely different conception of the development and progress of peoples and nations. I do not believe that the welfare of humanity will be promoted by a compact through which a few strong nations will dominate and control many weaker nations. The protection which article 10 is designed to furnish to feeble powers must inevitably lead either to their complete subjection or to continuous revolution. One of the most interesting reviews of a situation which has arisen in eastern Europe is from the pen of Mr. Frank H. Simonds, a famous war writer. It was published in the Evening Star of September 18, and it illustrates so clearly what American soldiers and American money are expected to do under article 10 that I desire to print it as an appendix to my remarks. The article relates to a controversy between Hungary, Serbia, and Roumania over a part of the territory which has been set apart by the treaty of peace to one or the other of these nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Without objection, leave to print the article is granted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have noted also a most significant paragraph in a speech delivered by Lloyd-George on September 17 before the International Brotherhood Congress, and I quote a brief passage from the report of his address:

> Alluding to the league of nations as an organized attempt to substitute fair play for force, the premier was heckled about Russia and Ireland, to which he replied: "We must have fair play in each case on both sides." He added that, at the time of the armistice, he had not foreseen that the league might be required to prevent small nations from destroying each other. "There never was a league of nations more needed," he declared. "I fear the welter of warring nations will continue, unless there is a strong band like that of the federated powers to insist upon peace. I see no hope for the world except in such a strong league."

About the same time I observed an interview with Mr. Henry Morgenthau, a member of one of the many investigating commissions roving through Europe. He is reported to have said:

> The only remedy I can see is the league of nations. The league must operate immediately to decide disputes, determine frontiers, and restore order in central Europe, which is threatened with anarchy. Only the league of nations can restore the confidence of new nations and inspire respect from Germany.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MOSES. That being the view of Mr. Morgenthau, can the Senator advance any opinion of his own as to why the treaty has so carefully left the league of nations out of consideration as an instrumentality for the determination of boundaries and committed that task to the five principal allied and associated powers?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not attempt to explain what seems to me a very strange inconsistency. I only know that when these borders and frontiers are established, it then becomes the duty of every member of the league to employ all the force, whether of men or money, to maintain and protect the boundaries that have thus been established.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator, of course, can not have overlooked that one boundary definitely established in the instrument itself, namely, that between the Netherlands and Belgium, has already produced a diplomatic rupture and may lead to very serious complications.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is quite true, Mr. President, and not only so, but the United States is said to have already employed its military or its naval forces in order to eject Italians from Fiume and to compel the restoration or delivery of that city, with its surrounding territory, to the Jugo-Slav State which has been created by the treaty.

Mr. MOSES. Further than that, Mr. President, if the press reports are true, the forces of the United States are acting in alliance with the forces of the inchoate Serb-Croat-Slovene State, a State which has nothing but nominal diplomatic recogniton, a State whose boundaries have not yet been established, a State whose people are not yet in harmony with each other in their various elements, a State with which we have formed no alliance through the constitutional methods, and a State with which we are not warranted in joining in warlike measures.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for pointing out these additional circumstances under which we will be called upon, as time goes on, to preserve order and protect borders throughout Europe.

All these utterances point unerringly in one direction—three or four powerful Governments, with the United States at the head for the time being, are to undertake the guardianship of the world. It will require a great military force and vast sums of money to defend these frontiers and keep these restless, warring, half-civilized people in peace with each other. The United States, by reason of its undiminished man power and its great resources, is to be the leader of this impossible undertaking. This seems to be one ideal, at least, so fondly cherished by those who are insistent that we must accept the command which Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan are so willing to bestow upon us.

Mr. President, if this attitude toward the nations of the earth were in any way tolerable, how long do you think it would be before these strong powers would find themselves in violent disagreement among themselves? We are already emphatically condemning, inferentially at least, our allies in the Shantung affair, and there would be many Shantungs before we had proceeded far in this ambitious program; but if the principal associated powers were to work in harmony, it would mean nothing else than complete and arbitrary mastery of the world. To me the whole proposal is wrong—hopelessly, viciously wrong—and it ought not to receive the assent of those who have behind them the traditions which spring from the history of the United States.

I do not pause to inquire whether the obligation imposed upon this country in article 10 is a legal or moral obligation. I recognize no distinction in such a case as this between legal and moral obligations. I freely grant, sir, that in this article we do not agree to follow the advice which the council may render with respect to the particular measures which should be taken in order to preserve territorial integrity and political independence, but we bind ourselves absolutely and irrevocably to do whatever in our judgment will most effectually accomplish the result. In honor, it binds us to send an army, if an army is necessary; to send a navy, if a navy is necessary; to send supplies, if supplies are necessary; to establish an embargo, if an embargo is necessary; in short, to do for the country assailed exactly what we would do for ourselves under like circumstances.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the Senator from Iowa ever contemplated article 10 as a method adopted not to put a stop to wars but to put a stop to wars of conquest?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I have contemplated the article in every light in which it can be viewed. The purpose of article 10 is to crystallize the world as it emerges from this conflict; it is to preserve, as I gather, the territorial integrity and the political independence of every nation as it then exists. I can understand how it might be wise from time to time for the United States to enter a war in order to overcome the desire of some nation for conquest; but my proposition is that it is immoral to ask the United States to agree to do that without knowing what the circumstances are under which it will be called upon to act.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator permit me to inquire as to the probabilities? When the Monroe doctrine was enunciated, nearly 100 years ago, it was a threat by the United States to every nation in Europe that we would regard it as an act of war if those nations of Europe, then bent on conquest, undertook to touch any nation of the Western Hemisphere. The Senator knows that that threat by the United States never made it necessary for us to send an army to Brazil or Ecuador or Colombia or to any other country in South or Central America, although the doing of that thing was involved by our threat. The Senator knows that that threat never cost a dollar or a man, but that it nevertheless prevented wars of conquest on the Western Hemisphere.

Now, if all the nations in this league, numbering practically all of the nations in the world, say they will unite in making the threat against any evil-doing nation that may attempt conquest which impairs the territorial integrity or political independence of any nation, does the Senator think that there is any more likelihood that any nation will bring down upon itself that overwhelming penalty than that the nations of Europe should have attacked the nations of North or Central or South America when we promulgated the Monroe doctrine? Is not the fact that the Monroe doctrine, enunciated by one Republic then weak, prevented war, prevented conquest in the Western Hemisphere, a good argument for believing that 20 or 30 nations engaging to prevent conquest anywhere in the world would have the effect of preventing an attempt of conquest?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can conceive a situation in which if Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States—they being the principal powers now in the world—were to agree among themselves that there should be no change whatever in the boundaries of the sovereignties of the world, that an attack upon those sovereignties would be unlikely. I grant that. It is against that which I protest.

I do not know that the sovereignties of these countries as they are now arranged ought to be continued; I do not know that Poland should have the boundaries forevermore that are now assigned to her; I do not know that Czechoslovakia should exist just as she is now arranged; I do not know that Roumania and Bulgaria and Turkey and the territories that have been assigned to them or to any other nation should continue as they are. The United States when it proclaimed the Monroe doctrine simply said, "We shall regard any attack upon or interference with the affairs of the Western Hemisphere as unfriendly to the United States, as intended to bring and probably resulting in harm and disaster to the institutions of the United States, and we will look upon any effort of that sort as unfriendly to our interests." We can not say that with respect to the future of the world; and it is just that against which I am complaining.

Mr. MOSES and Mr. HITCHCOCK addressed the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I add to what the Senator from Iowa has so vigorously said that conditions at the time the Monroe doctrine was promulgated were altogether dissimilar to those now existing. Then the European nations making colonizing efforts upon this continent were 3,000 miles away; they were dealing with a people who were dissimilar in blood, in language, in religion, and in traditions. Conditions in Europe to-day which will lead to future trouble—indeed, they have already provoked trouble under the very terms of this covenant—are wholly different from those which confronted the relations of European nations and the Latin-American peoples a hundred years ago. Over there, Mr. President, there are rivalrous nations of the same blood seeking to bring their own people within their boundaries. The conditions can not possibly be compared with those existing on this continent. We have already seen 23 wars spring up since the covenant of the league of nations was given to the world as a valentine last February, and Heaven only knows how many more wars we shall see if the covenant shall be given to the world as a Christmas present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, all that the Senator from New Hampshire says is true, but I base my objection to article 10 upon a much broader ground. It is well supported by the considerations stated by the Senator from New Hampshire; but we are asked now, without any knowledge of the future or what it will bring forth, without any possible information with respect to what the condition of the world 10, 20, or 25 years hence may be, to enter into an agreement to enforce present boundaries and frontiers, the present political independence of nations and existing institutions, for all time to come.

The United States had a perfect right to say to the world, if it has the power to support its statement, "We look upon the extension of autocratic or monarchial institutions in America as unfriendly to our country; we look upon an attempt of that sort as a menace and peril to the Republic which we have now established on this continent"; but does the Senator from Nebraska say that we have surrounded our proposed agreement to defend the boundaries of all the nations of the world in this covenant by any such restrictions, by any such considerations? We are bound by the act of some one else. In the United States we control the event; we may do what we like to defend the doctrine which we announced in 1823; but in article 10 we bind ourselves to do something that depends entirely upon the act or the movement of other and independent nations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator would not contend that the United States could undertake alone to put a stop to wars of conquest in the world? It can only do it by uniting with the other nations of the world.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope it will never do it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator believe in wars of conquest?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are times when wars of conquest are right, of course. The history of the whole world shows that there are wars of conquest which are wrong, tremendously wrong; but how did the world grow into the attitude which it now occupies? Does not the United States exist by virtue of conquest? You deny the validity of our own title to existence. We came into existence through conquest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator believes in wars of conquest, he is not a believer in a league to enforce peace. This covenant contemplates two kinds of wars and it endeavors to put a stop to both, as the Senator will admit: First, wars arising out of disputes, which it endeavors to settle by arbitration and by inquiry; and, second, wars of conquest, which it endeavors to settle by article 10. They can only be settled by a union of the nations of the world to put a stop to them by an agreement that the political independence and territorial integrity of nations shall not be attacked by other nations. If the Senator believes in wars of conquest, he does not believe in a league of nations.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, I believe in a league of nations only for the consideration of circumstances as they may exist at a given time. I believe that the judgment of the world ought to be recorded upon those circumstances. It is utterly impossible with accuracy and with justice to record that judgment in advance.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the extremely urgent necessity of the powers at Paris defining the line of demarcation between the governing authorities which were set up of necessity in Europe; that there was no way to establish order of government unless the geographical lines were drawn somewhere, and there was no other power except the emergent power which was gathered at Paris in the prosecution of the war by which those lines could be delimited.

Mr. MOSES. But, Mr. President, many of the lines have not yet been drawn.

Mr. OWEN. Most of them have been and some have to be surveyed and fixed, which takes time, of course.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have attempted to point out the duty which naturally devolved upon the United States at the conclusion of the war with Germany and the duty which naturally fell upon the countries of Europe. It is not true because it is a wise thing for Europe to endeavor to compose itself and to arrange its territory into sovereignties that therefore it is a wise thing for the United States to attempt to assist it in that very difficult, delicate, and burdensome work.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I wanted to call the attention of the Senator to the duty which arose to make a delimitation of the European boundaries. It is true, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] says, that that work has not been fully performed. It is difficult to arrange it; but commissions have been provided to do the surveying in order definitely to define those boundaries. It is because those boundaries are partly undefined and partly in dispute, even where defined, that civil broils have broken out between these States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not concern myself with that except sympathetically.

Mr. OWEN. But I should assume that the Senator would feel that the United States, having brought the war to a conclusion so far as the dispersion of military force is concerned, would feel obliged to participate to the extent of establishing a sound peace where our arms have been employed to end the violence of war. Power is required to compel peace, and I do not think we should desert our noble allies until this task is fairly finished.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not recognize it to be the duty of the United States to arrange the affairs of Europe to that extent.

I concur with the President in his often-repeated insistence that we can not, will not, divorce ourselves from the community of nations. We are a part of the world, an important part, and we must do our share in the world's work. Sir, we need have no concern about America and her place in the affairs of the earth. I plead for leadership as earnestly as can any advocate of an unconditional ratification of the league of nations; but my hope is that it will be a moral leadership, a leadership through the shining example of the justice which we shall render to all humanity, a leadership through sympathy with the oppressed and unfortunate everywhere. I do not want leadership conferred by caucus or council. I refuse to agree to defend frontiers without respect to their justice. I decline to commit my country to fight for a political independence which ought to be shattered and overthrown. We must leave the United States free to determine what morality, civilization, and righteousness require as the years go on. We must not involve America in entanglements the like of which Washington, Jefferson, and Madison could not have conceived when they so earnestly admonished their fellow men.

When formerly I enjoyed the privilege of addressing the Senate upon this subject I remarked that article 10 was beyond our constitutional authority. I listened with great interest to the recent speeches made by those exceedingly able lawyers, the Senators from Montana and Minnesota, in which they reached the common conclusion that this article is within the treaty-making power. It is, I know, an academic question under the present conditions, but I must be permitted to say that my original opinion remains unshaken. I grant at once the soundness of every decision they have cited, the correctness in reasoning of every text writer they have quoted, and the authenticity of all the historical references they have brought to our attention. I dispute none of these, but I deny the conclusion which has seemed to them so plain. I do not doubt our power to enter into such a treaty as we made with Panama. It is clear to me that we could properly make with Cuba a similar agreement, if we so desired. I go further and say that there would be much reason in the contention that we could make a treaty with such a country as Great Britain for mutual defense, for it would not be difficult to find that the United States had a real interest in such an alliance. It must not be understood, either, that I base my opinion upon the constitutional fact that Congress alone can declare war or raise armies. My objection from a legal standpoint to article 10 is that it changes the whole character of our Government and is, therefore, under the well-settled rule of the Supreme Court of the United States, beyond our constitutional authority. The Senators from Montana and Minnesota will not maintain, I believe, that the treaty-making power is without limitation; they will not insist, I am sure, that a treaty to be invalid must necessarily be repugnant to some express declaration of the Constitution; they will not, I am certain, deny that there must be some fair relation between the treaty we make and the government of the people of the United States. To illustrate, it could hardly be contended that we could enter into a treaty with Russia or with Turkey or with Bulgaria to tax the people of this country to maintain the school systems of those Governments upon the ground that education is essential to the maintenance of peace, law, and order. It is equally clear that we have no authority to enter into a treaty to preserve the political independence of the kingdom of Hedjaz upon the assumption that a disturbance there might imperil the safety of the people of the United States. In the treaty under consideration it is proposed that we do vastly more than this, for we bind ourselves to protect in this way the territory and the independence of all the nations of the earth, if all of them become parties to the league. The learning that can lead one to the conclusion that a country created by a constitution and governed by law can thus adventure into the field of abstract altruism has lost its path somewhere in the wilderness of imagination.

The thought I have advanced might be expanded indefinitely, but I forbear simply because I am altogether sure that not a single vote will, in the end, rest upon a consideration of constitutional limitations. I have made these suggestions solely to keep history straight and to indicate that I for one do not accept the theory of an unlimited treaty-making power.

Upon the quality of reservations, the newspapers, without much regard for consistency, have at various times classified me as a "mild reservationist," a "temperate reservationist," and as an "irreconcilable reservationist." How they received these impressions I do not know, for I have never been interviewed upon the subject and have never publicly uttered a word upon it except to reiterate the sentiments I expressed in my speech of last winter. I do not complain of these classifications, but I put their doubts, too, at rest now by saying that, if I had my way about the matter, the reservation, so far as article 10 is concerned, would be easy to formulate. I would like to write into the resolution of ratification the plain, simple statement that the United States assumes no obligation whatsoever under article 10. This is not to declare that I will not vote for the reservation upon that subject reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, for I expect to do so. I am only making it clear that I would prefer to vote for a reservation that would eliminate this article, so far as the United States is concerned, root, trunk, and branch; for it is not only constitutionally wrong, but it is morally wrong in that it robs us of the opportunity to do what we may know to be right when the occasion for action comes.

It has been somewhat difficult for me to determine the wisest course to pursue with respect to some of the amendments which have been proposed to the text of the treaty. I recognize the inequality and, therefore, injustice of the superior voting power given to the British Empire. The other nations signing the treaty seem to be satisfied with this disparity of influence, and I do not forget that the reservations to which I have referred rescue the United States from the power of both council and assembly in many vital matters affecting our national freedom and relieve us to a great extent from the obnoxious obligations upon which I have commented. I am naturally less concerned about the strength of Great Britain in the assembly than otherwise I would have been; but, notwithstanding these ameliorating circumstances, it is impossible for me to approve so flagrant a departure from the fundamental principles of fairness and equality.

I can not forbear the suggestion at this point, and I commend it to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that suitable provision ought to be made in the resolution of ratification for the absence or silence of the United States in both council and assembly when those subjects are being considered concerning which the United States declines to accept the treaty as it was signed. It would be manifestly wrong for our representatives to vote in matters relating to other countries which we repudiate, in our amendments or resolution of ratification, with respect to ourselves.

With regard to the amendment proposing the substitution of "China" for "Japan" in the article relating to the Shantung affair, I can do no more than to express in some way my deep regret that a conference constantly asserting with the utmost vehemence its devotion to the cause of humanity, to free institutions, and to self-determination should forget all of these fair promises at the first opportunity presented for their fulfillment. The truth is that this war has closed very much like every other war, with the good, old plan that "he may take who has the power and he may keep who can." The German, the Austrian, and the Russian garment was divided in the time-honored way. Great Britain took what she wanted, France took what she wanted, Italy took what she wanted, Japan took what she wanted, and as there was some territory that nobody wanted it was set up into something like a half dozen new sovereignties, which the United States as her part is asked to protect, defend, and maintain. Throughout this discussion I have been trying to show how unfortunate it would be for the United States to undertake the responsibility which must accompany this division of peoples and territories, and as much as I deplore the wrong done China I must adhere to the principles I have announced and vote against the Shantung amendment brought forward by the committee.

The remaining amendments relate, as I remember them, to a single subject, namely, the exclusion of the United States from the various committees and commissions—except the reparations commission—which are to be raised or appointed to carry into effect the terms of peace imposed upon Germany. I am in perfect sympathy with the spirit of these amendments. I would rather have accomplished the end in view through the resolution of ratification, but, after all, there is no substantial difference between the two methods, and it is the object which interests me rather than the path which leads to its attainment.

My mind is chiefly fastened upon two things—the protection of the United States against the power over our affairs which, under the guise of peace, is conferred upon the league of nations and of escaping obligations which we have no authority to assume and which would inevitably lead us into all the storms which will sweep over these vast populations, in whose trials and troubles we can have no more than a sympathetic interest.

All of us know, without being reminded by the lamentations of the President or the ex-President, or by the shrieks and denunciations of the newspapers, how important it is that the peace treaty with Germany and her three allies be concluded; but it is infinitely more important, for the United States at least, that it be concluded in a manner compatible with the spirit of our institutions and in a way which will insure the integrity of this Government than that it be brought to an end at any particular time. Whether it is ratified as it was signed or with amendments and reservations, peace and order will not come to the world until weary years of conflict have settled the deeper disturbances which are shaking our social and industrial fabric to its very foundations. It is hard for me to understand how honest men can go about the country asserting that peace with Germany and a league of nations can make men and women contented with their lot or surrender the principles for which they are fighting. This is not the occasion for an inquiry into the causes of unrest, but he who endeavors to instill into the public mind the false hope that peace with Germany, with or without the league of nations, means peace for the world in the relations of men with each other; that it means a restoration of confidence in the justice of organized society; that it means credit for commerce; that it means producing, selling, and buying according to ancient customs, is inflicting an incalculable injury upon the people of this country. My sincere desire to dispose speedily of the German treaty is not founded upon the faintest hope that it will quiet unrest, but based upon the profound conviction that we ought to be free as quickly as possible to turn our thought to some solution of the problems in our domestic affairs, which are the gravest which ever challenged the minds and hearts of humanity.

In undertaking this work it seems to me an unforgivable crime to embarrass ourselves with all the evil influences of Europe. We all realize that what is now taking place in that unhappy continent will necessarily have some effect upon our people, but the commonest prudence demands that we limit the effect, so far as it is possible to do it. America can help the world in this grave crisis, but it can only help it by showing the way out of the labyrinth into which we have wandered. This is the reason I am appealing for a free America—free to exercise her own genius and power in doing justice to her own citizens, high or low, rich or poor. This is the reason I am appealing for an untrammeled America—at full liberty to lead mankind by precept, practice, and persuasion into the paths of emulation. Mr. President, if America is shackled to the proposed league of nations just as it is written, she will go blindly and blunderingly into the future, incapable of guiding her own people safely through these dark and difficult days.

Mr. President, I would stand—if I stood alone—for an America with the right to choose, from time to time, the company she keeps; for an America at liberty to follow her own conscience as the events of the future transpire; for an America which all the nations of the earth are powerless to order from right doing or command to wrongdoing; for an America concerned for the world but devoted first and always to the protection and welfare of her own people. [Applause in the galleries.]

APPENDIX 1.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Wednesday, Feb. 26, 1919.]

"PROPOSED CONSTITUTION OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I may assume, I think, that the most of us have some fighting blood in our veins, but, notwithstanding the natural, the human inclination to the battle field, I hope that the discussion of the greatest, most fundamental, most vital question propounded to the American people since we first assumed a place among the nations of the earth will proceed upon that high level which excludes prejudice or passion. I hope that it may go forward without a challenge of the motives of those who may engage in it, so that eventually the people of the United States may render a decision upon the question which they must presently answer with all the intelligence which the twentieth century can command.

"I listened with infinite pleasure to the lofty strains of patriotism as they were poured out by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and every moment I thank God I am an American, and that I inherit in common with all my fellow countrymen the traditions, the wisdom, the example, the teaching of the age of Washington, of Jefferson, of Monroe, of Lincoln, and their illustrious associates.

"I listened to the graceful periods, the eloquent periods, of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis], who, as I observed not long ago, is the interpreter, and properly so, of both the sayings and the silences of the White House. I desire to say to him—and I mark with pleasure that he is before me—that if it were within human power to convince me that it is better to be a citizen of the league of nations than a citizen of the United States he would have accomplished it.

"Mr. President, in a purely preliminary way and as a prelude to the analysis which I shall presently attempt of the proposed constitution of the league of nations, I beg to call to the attention of the Senate and the country certain parts of the speech delivered by the President in Boston, for, in my judgment, he unfolds, with his usual felicity, not only that which is open to our eyes but that which has hitherto been uncertain and vague. I do this without a single suggestion of criticism. I do it because he has enabled me to understand what is really intended in the proposed constitution better than I have ever understood it before.

"Speaking of the acclaim with which the people of Europe have met the American representatives, he says:

"And in the midst of it all every interest seeks out, first of all, when it reaches Paris, the representatives of the United States. Why? Because—and I think I am stating the most wonderful fact in history—because there is no nation in Europe that suspects the motives of the United States.

"Was there ever so wonderful a thing seen before? Was there ever so moving a thing? Was there ever any fact that so bound the Nation that had won that esteem forever to deserve it?

"I would not have you understand that the great men who represent the other nations there in conference are disesteemed by those who know them. Quite the contrary. But you understand that the nations of Europe have again and again clashed with one another in competitive interest. It is impossible for men to forget those sharp issues that were drawn between them in times past. It is impossible for men to believe that all ambitions have all of a sudden been foregone. They remember territory that was coveted; they remember rights that it was attempted to extort; they remember political ambitions which it was attempted to realize. And, while they believe that men have come into a different temper, they can not forget these things, and so they do not resort to one another for a dispassionate view of the matters in controversy. They resort to that Nation which has won the enviable distinction of being regarded as the friend of mankind.

"Again, he says:

"We set up a great ideal of liberty, and then we said, 'Liberty is a thing that you must win for yourself; do not call upon us.' And think of the world that we would leave. Do you realize how many new nations are going to be set up in the presence of old and powerful nations in Europe and left there, if left by us, without a disinterested friend?

"Mr. President, this unveils the picture. No one can congratulate the President of the United States more heartily than I do with respect to his unparalleled reception in Europe. No one can recognize more thoroughly than I do the mighty influence he has exercised upon the deliberations of the conference assembled in Paris.

"It is, however, as plain as noonday that it is his conception of a league of nations that the United States, being the only friend, or disinterested friend, which these new nations of eastern and southern Europe possess, it has become our duty to maintain and protect them against the avarice, the greed, the power of their fellow nations in Europe. He so declares with the utmost precision.

"Here we have the real question which must be determined eventually by the American people. Shall the United States not only attempt to create these nations which are growing out of the most destructive war in which mankind ever engaged, but is it our policy and shall we assume as our obligation that as against the ambitions, against the power of their sister nations in Europe, we must guard and protect them?

"Mr. President, this constitution is not a constitution for permanent peace. It is a constitution for the guardianship on the part of the United States of the weaker nations of Europe. It is not a league for the prevention of war. It is a league for invitation to war, although I do not assert and I do not believe that those who are responsible for the terms in which it is framed have aught but the highest desire to promote the welfare of humanity.

"The President of the United States believes that this compact should be made because he is sincerely of the opinion that the United States can and will control the league of nations and may use it for the government of the earth in the welfare of the people of the earth.

"Lloyd-George is in favor of this form of compact because he believes that Great Britain can control the league which it is proposed now to create. I doubt not that his sincerity is as deep and pervading as that of the President of the United States, but both of them have no other conception, as is here clearly betrayed, of the province of a league of nations than as an instrument to govern the world in all its vital respects.

"But a discordant note has come floating over the sea. At the very time I was occupied in reading the address of the President at Boston my attention was directed to an article by Frank H. Simonds, which was published in the Washington Star of last night. Mr. Simonds has been one of the great correspondents and writers upon the war. If there has been a man in all of the list of contributors to the literature of the war who has analyzed its meaning and who has described its progress accurately that man is Mr. Simonds. He views the matter from a friendly standpoint, for he has been as stout an advocate of the policies of America as represented in the declarations of the President of the United States as any man either at home or abroad. Mark his perception of the situation and mark his description of it. I read very briefly from this article:

"I have tried many times in these dispatches to point out the peculiar situation of France with the resulting condition of mind and of spirit. It is an unfortunate fact, but it is a fact, that as a consequence of the course pursued by Mr. Wilson in Paris the peace conference has come more and more, both in the minds of the French people and of Americans about the peace commission, to be a battle between Wilson and Clemenceau, in which Mr. Wilson has been championing abstract principles of justice and M. Clemenceau advocating measures which represent questions of life and death to France.

"France come to the peace conference at the end of four and a half years of war, fought mainly upon her soil, with a population diminished by 3,000,000 as a consequence, with half a dozen Provinces in ruins and a score of cities wrecked, to ask two things: Reparation for material injuries and guaranties against future attacks.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. Wilson came to Paris resolved that there should be a league of nations. Encountering at Paris this unanimous French motion, finding French interest and French attention fixed upon the salvation of France rather than upon the formulation of the principles of a league of nations, Mr. Wilson and those associated with him were not successful in concealing their disappointment or their disapproval of what seemed to them a particularistic national policy. When France as a whole asked Mr. Wilson to go and see her devastated regions that he might understand her heart, he returned a cold and unequivocal negative. I do not think that any single act of any man ever carried with it profounder disappointment than Mr. Wilson's refusal to go to the northern regions and see what the boche had done.

"And we have had week after week a slow but sure change in French emotion with respect to the President. He was hailed by the little people of France as a savior. He was hailed as a man who came from another world to deliver France and other peoples of the world from the shadow of tragedy which had been, and little by little his course here had the effect at least of creating the impression that he cared nothing for the life or death of France, that he was not concerned with those things which the tragic years of war had burned into the soul of every French man and woman.

"I do not think it is possible accurately to represent how profound was the disappointment of France at this course of the American President. A sense first of desertion and then of utter isolation crept into the French heart as more and more the American attitude toward France passed from mere coldness with respect of French necessities to open criticism and hardly concealed suspicion. I do not think one would exaggerate by saying that three months ago France believed the war won, and to-day, as a result of what has occurred here in the peace conference, there is something amounting to real terror lest the war shall be lost after all and France left alone again across the pathway of a Germany increased in power and population by the last war.

"Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

"Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

"Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator give the date of the newspaper which contains the articles he has just read?

"Mr. CUMMINS. I saw the article in a paper published last night. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] calls my attention to the fact that it was published on Sunday. This article is dated Paris, February 20, of the present year.

"Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if it would not interrupt the Senator, I should like to state that there was in the Washington Sunday Star, of February 23, 1919, an article entitled 'Prestige of the President in Europe now at low ebb Simonds asserts,' written by Frank H. Simonds. That is dated from Paris, February 21, 1919. It is a more extended article even than the one which the Senator from Iowa has read.

"Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not read this article for the purpose of furnishing ground for criticism against the President. I read it simply to show the points of view as they are now understood in France; to show that what France wants is protection against Germany. France is not so keenly interested nor could she be so keenly interested in the establishment of the nations of the earth in their various borders and their maintenance by the United States or by Great Britain as she is in erecting a bulwark between her and her enemy Germany. I read this article because it seems to me it teaches us that, first and foremost, we ought to agree upon the terms of peace which we shall impose upon this enemy of mankind, and thus protect not only France but the whole world against her aggressions in the future.

"Mr. President, if I felt free to follow my inclination, I would defer my observations upon the proposed constitution for a league of nations until the Committee on Foreign Relations holds its conference with the President and until we hear, as undoubtedly we will hear, from the distinguished Senators composing that committee. Unhappily, however, I do not feel free to postpone this comment, and for this reason: The Congress now in session expires on March 4. We are informed that immediately thereafter the President will return to Europe to conclude the labors he has undertaken. Before the constitution of the league is finally adopted by the peace conference the President ought to know the views of every Senator with respect to its terms. It would be most unfortunate if the nations represented at the conference were to conclude a treaty upon this subject and return to their respective countries only to find that their work had been disapproved by the Senate of the United States, leaving an instrument of such vital importance to the world without force or effect. I believe it is not only the privilege but the duty of every Senator to exercise his constitutional prerogative and to advise the President before he returns to France of his opinion upon a matter which so deeply concerns not alone the people of this country but of all countries who have organized themselves into governments. As I look at it, it is of far greater importance that we discharge this duty at this time than it is to consider appropriation bills or legislation of any character. Inasmuch as we may well yield to the members of the Foreign Relations Committee after the conference to which I have referred takes place, some of us must speak now or not at all.

"Mr. President, no greater mistake could be made than to assume that there may not be an effective compact among nations, the sole purpose of which is to prevent, so far as humanly possible, future wars, without surrendering a single necessary attribute of our own sovereignty. I can not concur in the argument which seems to lead to the conclusion that any form of internationalism is an unwise invasion of nationalism. I can not agree that the highest ideals of Americanism preclude cooperation among nations looking toward the abolition of war. From the very beginning of our national life; indeed, from a time antedating the triumphant close of the Revolution by five years, or more, we have been making treaties of peace and amity with the various powers of the world, and we have now a long and honorable series of agreements for the settlement of international disputes. The United States was a party to The Hague convention, and it joined in establishing The Hague tribunal. In 1909 this country participated in the London conference and approved its work, a conference that was called and held for the purpose of civilizing, clarifying, and simplifying the law of nations.

"I am saying these things not because anyone has specifically denied them but because it is helpful just now to remember that there is an internationalism which is not only in harmony with the most exalted spirit of nationalism but which supplements and strengthens that national power which every self-respecting government must exercise for itself. It must be clear to every thoughtful person that there must be in a world like ours, where an increasing intimacy among nations has been brought about by the genius of invention, the imperative demands of commerce, the drifting tides of population; and, with the constantly growing opportunities of conflict and controversy, a developing internationalism that will meet successfully conditions as they change from year to year. It is not my purpose to enlarge upon this thought or to expand my observations by a more specific recital of the history of mankind, and I mention it simply that you may have it in mind as I turn my attention to the immediate subject which is now uppermost in all discussion throughout the civilized world.

"It is my belief that the close of the unparalleled conflict in which we have been engaged presents the most favorable opportunity that we ever have had or that is likely to occur in years and years to come to do something that will be a distinct advance toward preventing war in the future. I do not believe that treaties with this object in view should precede the settlement of the terms of peace which are to be imposed upon Germany.

"I have just read the heart-breaking emotions of France, awakened simply because the theory of a league of nations to enforce peace precedes the settlement of the terms of peace with Germany and leaves France hopeless in her fear of future encroachments. It is my opinion that we should first dispose of Germany, and that immediately thereafter the peace conference now assembled in Paris should make a determined effort for peace among all nations and for all time to come.

"With respect to the proposed constitution of the league, to which President Wilson has explicitly given his approval and which undoubtedly commands the assent of the remaining American commissioners, I have this to say before I enter upon any analysis of its somewhat confused and complicated terms. From my standpoint, there is some good in it, and I sincerely hope that at some stage of the proceedings of the Senate I may have an opportunity to express in a definite way my approval not only of the purpose in view but of these parts themselves. There is more that is bad in it; and it is my prayer that these parts may be stricken from it. In order that there may be no doubt about my position, I desire to say to the Senate—and I am saying it to the country as well—that if I were compelled to vote upon the instrument as a whole as now proposed I would unhesitatingly vote against it, because there are articles and parts of articles in the proposed treaty which are not only far beyond our authority to make but which change the whole character of our Government and overturn the institutions upon which we have so long depended for the safety of our people and the perpetuity of our independence. There are provisions in it which not only degrade the spirit of our people but put it beyond the power of the Republic to 'establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity,' and so fulfill, as we ought to fulfill, the initial declaration of the Constitution of the United States.

"It requires no close inquiry into the sentiment of the American people to be certain that there is a universal and passionate desire to do something, to enter into some compact to prevent war with all its deadly and destructive consequences. Nor can it be denied that at this juncture in the world's affairs they believe that something can be done to facilitate a peaceful settlement of international controversies which hitherto have led to the battle field. It is this overwhelming conviction which finds expression in the tumultuous applause which thrills every audience as it listens to the glowing appeals for a league of nations.

"I for one share the feeling with all the intensity of a lover of humanity and a profound believer in the progress of the world. I can not believe, however, that very many of these people will insist that the overthrow of American institutions is necessary in order to accomplish the beneficent purpose they have in mind and to attain the end they so fervently desire. I do not intend to dwell upon those articles which, as I look at the subject, tend in the right direction. I will be better understood if I trace the outlines of the compact which I think ought to emerge from the struggle just closed.

"First. We ought to agree, and all other nations ought to agree, that justiciable disputes—and by justiciable disputes I mean those issues which can be determined by the application of recognized law to established facts—should be settled either by arbitration or adjudication; and we ought to agree, and all other nations ought to agree, without equivocation or reserve, that we and they will abide by and perform the award or judgment.

"Second. We ought to agree, and all other nations ought to agree, that with respect to other nonarbitrable disputes—those which relate to the welfare of the country itself, those which are necessary to its existence, those principles and those policies which must be maintained if the Government itself is to exist—war shall not be made until some permanent, regular, international body, in which every member of the league is represented, shall have had a fair opportunity to discuss and consider it—a body that would combine the enlightened conscience of the world. I am willing, so far as the United States is concerned and my lot and part in it, to agree that we will not make war against any nation until we have discussed the issue, whether it is arbitrable or nonarbitrable, in the face and in the hearing of the whole of civilized humanity. Upon such questions, however, there should be no award, no judgment, and the sanction should be confined to the moral influences which time, thought, and free discussion will awaken.

"Mr. REED rose.

"Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Missouri wish to ask me a question?

"Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to do so if it will not interrupt the Senator. I do not want to interrupt him.

"Mr. CUMMINS. I should prefer to go on. I shall be glad, however, to answer any questions that may occur to Senators after I have finished.

"Mr. REED. I will defer the inquiry, then. Perhaps the Senator will answer it further on in his discourse without interruption.

"Mr. CUMMINS. Third. If any nation should refuse to submit a proper controversy to judgment, or refuse to perform the judgment when rendered, or refuse to delay war until the combined powers have an opportunity to consider the subject in all its aspects, I am willing to agree that ostracism shall be the penalty inflicted upon the offending nation.

"Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will now ask the Senator a question if he will permit me to do so.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

"Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

"Mr. REED. If ostracism of the character mentioned in this constitution were to be adopted, how would that possibly fail to produce war?

"Mr. CUMMINS. I am about to prove—at least, to my own conscience—that the provisions in the constitution before us are an invitation to war and not measures to prevent war.

"Fourth. It is my firm belief that the compact—and when I say 'compact' I mean the instrument itself, the thing that we sign, the undertaking that we assume—should contain a program of disarmament. I am utterly unwilling to confide to any such body of men as is proposed for the executive council of the league of nations the power to decide for the United States, for Great Britain, or for any other country the program of disarmament. We should agree now to disarm; and, after all, in disarmament largely lies the hope—and, I think, the only hope—of permanent peace. The constitution proposed in Paris is most disappointing in this regard, for a careful study of its provisions gives us little right to believe that there will be any disarmament among the strong powers which are to give the compact life and vigor.

"Who expects Great Britain to disarm under the proposed constitution? Who expects the United States to disarm? No one who surveys the subject with an intelligent and unprejudiced mind.

"This is the international compact which I think the American people are waiting, hoping, and praying for, and the acclaim with which the Paris proposal has been received in some parts of the country and by some bodies of the country is due to the fact that they see in it the approach to the fulfillment of their dreams. I can not, and I will not, believe that Americans with red blood in their veins, with fervid longing for peace in their hearts, who have pride in the history of their country, and who love the institutions with which the honorable distinction of the United States throughout the world is inseparably connected, will endure, much less approve, those parts of the proposed constitution to which I am about to refer; parts which, in my judgment—and I express this conclusion with the utmost solemnity and after the most mature reflection—not only neutralize all the benefits of a peaceful settlement of disputes between nations, but which affirmatively destroy the national structure, and which commit the United States to a course which must inevitably end in humiliation and disaster.

"Article 10 of the proposed constitution is as follows:

"The high contracting parties undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the executive council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation shall be fulfilled.

"There is nothing in this article, however, dependent upon the discretion of the executive council, so far as our duty under it would be concerned. We agree absolutely, positively, unreservedly to preserve the territorial independence and the political independence of all the nations parties to the league, and for all time to come; for there is no provision in the proposed treaty that gives any nation the right to withdraw from it, and there is no provision by which any of its parts can be changed against the will of a single member of the executive council.

"Mr. President, I do not assert that in the ordinary sense this article is unconstitutional. Within its sphere our Government has all the attributes of sovereignty, and making treaties with other nations is one of these attributes; and, moreover, the right to make treaties is specifically recognized in the Constitution.

"Alliances, offensive and defensive, have been common among the powers of the world, and while I do not recall a single instance of that character in our own history, I have no doubt of our constitutional authority to enter into a treaty of that kind. I have some doubt with regard to our power to enter into the treaty proposed in the Paris constitution, a doubt arising from the universality and duration of the obligation we are asked to assume; but I do not rest my objection to the article upon our lack of power to enter into the obligation.

"I am opposed to it because it is the most destructive, unjust, and reactionary proposal which was ever submitted to a patriotic and intelligent people. I predict that when the citizens of the United States thoroughly grasp the meaning of the proposed agreement and fairly understand its inevitable consequences it will be rejected in a storm of obloquy, the like of which has never been witnessed within the borders of the Republic.

"Let us survey it for a moment and endeavor to gather its true import. It means that a few men assembled in Paris in the year 1919 are dividing the whole world into sovereignties, and are assigning the innumerable men and women who in all time to come are to inhabit the earth to these few sovereignties, sovereignties which the ambitions of the men of this, a passing generation, are pleased to call eternal. The man who, even in his thought, is willing to play with the fate of mankind in this fashion is indifferent to both the lessons of the past and the judgment of posterity. We are solemnly asked to guarantee that the boundaries of nations, as they now exist or as they will exist when the peace conference has redrawn the map of Europe, Asia, Africa, and Oceania, shall remain without change forever.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that statement should be limited somewhat?

"Mr. CUMMINS. I do not see any proper limitation for the statement.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. The guaranty only relates to those nations which are in this league, and it only guarantees them against outside aggression.

"Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I assume—I must assume—that it is intended that this constitution shall finally draw into the membership of the league all the nations of the world. I assume that that must be its purpose; for if we are to accept any other conclusion and are to look upon it as simply an agreement between a few nations—four, five, six, or seven—to become masters of the whole earth, it is still more objectionable than from the standpoint I occupy.

"The agreement is limited to the members of the league, and as I read the article—and I think everybody had that in mind—that so far as the distinction between external aggression and internal revolution is concerned, there is no materiality in it, although I intend to treat that entirely from the external standpoint.

"Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that six or seven nations constitute the league, and they alone can protect and guarantee the integrity of each other's domain. Even if the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is correct about that, the very next section provides that these six or seven nations, if they constitute a league, shall boss all the rest of the world, and that they have the right in case of war or any threat of war to proceed to take such action as they see fit; of course, if they are to take action in the case of any threat of war it would undoubtedly be exercised in order to prevent invasion. There are other sections of a similar character.

"Mr. CUMMINS. It is utterly impossible to give any other interpretation than that the agreement which we are asked to make will bind us to use all the power, the strength, the force we have to preserve the territorial integrity and the political independence of every considerable country in the world.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Martin of Kentucky in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

"The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 14516) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

"Mr. CUMMINS. The statesmen who are now gathered in Paris might, with equal propriety, have ventured to set bounds to the Heavenly Kingdom or prescribe the activities of the Prince of Darkness. How dare we attempt to determine what sovereignties the civilization of the next century will demand? How dare we attempt to give judgment upon the welfare of all the oncoming generations?

"The proposal is to gridiron the earth with an inflexible territorial pattern. It would be just as reasonable that the constitution of the league of nations should declare that neither man nor woman should pass from one sovereignty to another as to declare that the boundaries of sovereignties should remain forever inviolate.

"I can not help wondering whether those who have submitted this proposition to us have looked over the past and considered what the effect of an agreement of this character would have been, assuming its enforcement, if it had been adopted at other periods of the world's history. I will not concern myself with the ancient days, the days of Alexander, of Rome in her power, of Charlemagne in his triumphs. I am thinking of the days when Charles and Philip of Spain held the world in their grasp.

"If anyone in the days that are left of this session shall have occasion to address himself to this subject, I ask him to tell the country and tell the Senate whether he believes that an agreement of this sort in the days of Charles and Philip of Spain would have helped the civilization of the world and would have accomplished justice among men.

"I am thinking of the days when Napoleon swept over Europe and when a league of nations with the article which I have just read, enforced by France and England, would have choked liberty to death. I am asking those who stand for this extraordinary provision in the proposed constitution whether they believe that it would have been well for mankind if France and England in the days of Napoleonic power should have entered into an agreement of this character which would have divided the world and preserved inviolate the sovereignties which had been established. I am thinking of all the years of the seventeenth century under such an agreement, and we may test the validity, the wisdom of a compact of this sort by the evidences of history. I am thinking now of all the years of the seventeenth century when such an agreement between England, France, and Spain, confirmed by the remaining nations of Europe, respecting territorial integrity in the North American Continent, would have given Canada forever to France, would have partitioned the territory of the United States and Mexico among England, France, and Spain, and would for all time have precluded the Republic of the United States.

"I would like some one to tell me whether he thinks it would have been well for the world if France, England, and Spain among them had entered into an agreement in those days to have preserved inviolate the territory which each claimed for its own in the Western Hemisphere.

"There is no student of history, however dull of comprehension, who does not know that the discord, rivalry, and wars of these three great European powers made it possible for our beloved country to emerge from their struggles a free and independent Nation. I am thinking of the first half of the nineteenth century, when Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California became parts of the United States. It matters not whether the Texan war was justifiable or unjustifiable; it matters not whether our war with Mexico was defensible or indefensible; the decree of civilization demanded this territory for the Republic, and let the men and women who inhabit these fair and fruitful regions stand up and declare whether they are willing to bind their country to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every nation on earth as it shall exist when the peace conference at Paris concludes its labors.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call the Senator's attention that there, again, he mentions every nation on earth, whereas the guaranty only refers to members of the league, and the constitution of the league specifically makes ineligible certain nations of the earth.

"Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska has no doubt that the war between the Texas Republic and Mexico was a matter of external aggression, I am sure. He has no doubt that the war between the United States and Mexico was a war of external aggression; and if this compact had been in force among the nations of the world, the acquisition of that territory, the pride of every citizen of the United States, would have been impossible. But it is not less so concerning the illustration I gave of France, England, and Spain. The Senator from Nebraska knows if there had been such an agreement preserving existing territorial limits and it had been observed by England, France, and Spain there could not have been, through any possibility, independence in North America. It required the war between Great Britain and France and between France and Spain to make it possible that America should come into her own; and if all the countries in the world had been banded together to insure the territorial integrity of the possessions of these three mighty powers, and the powers themselves had observed their agreement, this hemisphere would still be a possession of one of the European dynasties.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was not questioning the historical reference of the Senator. I was objecting to the statement that this league proposes to guarantee the independence and territorial integrity of all the countries on the earth. It does not propose to do that.

"Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me the very great privilege of asking the Senator from Nebraska a question?

"Mr. CUMMINS. With pleasure.

"Mr. REED. I am directing my interrogatory to the Senator from Nebraska. The position of the Senator from Nebraska is that only the territorial integrity of those who may be permitted to belong to the league is guaranteed. That is correct?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is correct.

"Mr. REED. Is the Senator, then, an adherent to the doctrine that those who join the league are to have their territory protected, and that the rest of the world shall be a prey to the members of the league?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not at all.

"Mr. REED. Is that the idealism we are now seeking?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; it is entirely different from that. The league is dedicated to the idea of preserving peace, and it contains provisions which make it possible to use the agencies of the league to prevent war even among those who are not members of the league, but it does not undertake to guarantee to any country not a member of the league its territorial integrity or its independence, and it specifically makes ineligible to membership in the league certain countries of the world which are incapable of maintaining their international obligations.

"Mr. REED. But this is the point I want to make: If the members of the league guarantee each other as to their territory, then they exclude from the league certain other nations. Is it the proposition that those other nations shall be allowed to invade each other or not?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. The proposition is that that is a matter which the league will use its agencies and its resources to prevent.

"Mr. REED. To prevent?

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. It will undertake to do what it can to prevent wars among those who are not members of the league.

"Mr. REED. Very well, but——

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Just as the United States has used its agencies in the Western Hemisphere.

"Mr. REED. Now, if the Senator will pardon an interruption, when it uses its agencies to prevent war between those other nations that are not in the league it does prevent the change of their territory; it does maintain their territories the same as it maintains the territories of the States within the league.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not at all; there is no guaranty at all; it simply——

"Mr. REED. But is it——

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me finish, if the Senator pleases. It simply undertakes to use its offices, its agencies, and its resources to adjust disputes between States which are outside the league.

"Mr. REED. The Senator says to adjust now. A moment ago he said 'to prevent,' and the language of the instrument is 'prevent.'

"Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the language is not 'prevent.' The language is 'to consider disputes' between nations which are outside the league.

"Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this is digressing a little, but very instructive. I am glad to be able to recur again to the thought of the Senator from Nebraska. Undoubtedly its obligation is confined to the members of the league, and our obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations of the world is limited to the nations which sign the compact. It will be infinitely more unjust, infinitely more objectionable, if it is the purpose of those who are controlling the destinies of this instrument to confine the privileges of the league to a few self-appointed nations and to refuse admission to the great body of civilized peoples who need its protection, if there is any protection in it.

"However, the point I am making is not disturbed by the suggestions of the Senator from Nebraska. I am not advocating wars of aggression, and I fervently hope that when the welfare of humanity requires changes in sovereign boundaries they may be peacefully effected; but I would hold myself false to the interests of mankind if I should vote to ratify a treaty which obligated my country, under all circumstances and under every condition, to send our men to death on the battle field in any and every land to maintain the boundaries which are now established. I know, the Senator from Nebraska knows, every person within the sound of my voice knows, and every thoughtful citizen of the Republic knows, we would not fulfill any such obligation, and if we were to enter into it we would be guilty of worse than Punic faith.

"I pass, Mr. President, to article 19, which I beg to read:

"To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there shou.d be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in the constitution of the league.

"The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be intrusted to ad anced nations, who by reason of their resources, their experience, their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandatories on behalf of the league.

"The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the principle of the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions, and other similar circumstanc s.

"Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development in which their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory power until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the mandatory power.

"Other peoples, especially those of central Africa, are at such a stage that the mandatory must be responsible for the administration of the territory under such conditions as will guarantee freedom of conscience or religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, the prohibition of abuses, such as the slave trade, the arms traffic, and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defense of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other members of the league.

"There are territories, such as southwest Africa and certain of the South Pacific Isles, which, owing to the sparseness of their populations, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centers of population, or their geographical continuity to the mandatory State, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the mandatory State as integral portions thereof, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the irterests of the indigenous population.

"In every case of mandate, the mandatory State shall render to the league an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

"The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory State shall, if not previously agreed upon by the high contracting parties, in each case be explicitly defined by the executive council in a special act or charter.

"The high contracting parties further agree to establish at the seat of the league a mandatory commission to receive and examine the annual reports of the mandatory powers, and to assist the league in insuring the observance of the terms of all mandates.

"When I first read article 10, I was under the impression that nothing could surpass it in its repugnance to good morals and to the civilization of the world; but I am bound to admit that article 19 is the climax of conflict. This article is not only bad in and of itself, but it is the grossest violation of our powers under the Constitution that has ever fallen under my observation. I can best examine it by taking a concrete instance of what may happen under it, and I select this instance because it is what the members of the league expect shall happen under it.

"The league is authorized to issue a mandate requiring the United States to take possession and administer the affairs of Turkey. I think it is well understood in Paris that under that provision, which declares that the wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the mandatory power, as explained and interpreted by the speech of the President in Boston, in which he says that all those countries want us to rule over them rather than Great Britain, France, or Italy, and it may be, I think, assumed that when the mandate issues from the executive council of the league, it will be to the United States and it will command us to take possession of the Turkish Empire. I repeat, the league is authorized to issue a mandate requiring the United States to take possession and administer the affairs of Turkey with an indefinite territory both east and west of Constantinople. This mandate will command the United States to undertake the tutelage of the Turkish Empire until the people who live in this uncertain territory are 'able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world.'

"This gigantic task is to be assumed upon the theory 'that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization.' This trusteeship may be for years or it may be forever, depending entirely upon the judgment of the league respecting our success in bringing these people up to the high standards which the league may demand for self-governing countries. I confess to more amazement when I reflect upon this proposal than ever filled my mind before. It does not require a man trained in the study of the law to determine instantly that the people of the United States never gave to the President and Congress, or both, the authority to do this thing. There is not a semblance of power in the Constitution to perform such an act, and the proposal is more inconsistent, if that can be, with the spirit of the Constitution than with its letter.

"I will not refer at this moment to the decisions of the Supreme Court, in which that great tribunal has undertaken to define, to explain, to illustrate our authority to enter into treaties with foreign nations, but at some future time that study will be found exceedingly interesting and very enlightening.

"Unquestionably we have the right to acquire territory by conquest, and it is just as clear that we have the right to acquire it by purchase, but we have not conquered the Turkish Empire, nor have we bought one foot of its soil. Moreover, when we acquire territory, whether by conquest or purchase, it becomes the territory of the United States, controlled by the laws of the United States, and destined either for admission as a State, or to be governed directly as a Territory, or to be disposed of as the will of Congress may direct.

"To insist that we can take possession of the territory of any nation, with its millions of people, simply to act as the tutor of these people and to police the country, solely to make the inhabitants better men and women, is the wildest fancy which ever entered the human mind.

"But this is not all. We are commanded to govern Turkey, not according to the laws which our authorities may enact, but to govern its people, to educate them, to train them, to make them able to stand alone, under the direction and according to the instructions of the league. I quote again from article 19:

"In every case of mandate, the mandatory shall render to the league an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

"The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory State shall, if not previously agreed upon by the high contracting parties, in each case be explicitly defined by the executive council in a special act or charter.

"We are thus not only to assume the responsibility of governing Turkey, but we must attempt to do it in the manner and degree required by the league. If we take the Turkish Empire, and may lawfully do so, it is ours to control, and we can no more surrender that sovereignty to the executive council of the league of nations than we could assign the Constitution of the United States to the British Parliament and vest that body with the authority to govern the people of the United States.

"What I have said I am quite willing to admit is a question for lawyers, and if I ever hear of one who affirms the validity of such a transaction I shall be tempted to tear my certificate of admission to the bar of the courts of this country into little pieces and consign the fragments to the flames, and thereafter I shall do my best to forget that I ever belonged to the honorable profession of the law.

"With a great many the authority to execute this mad proposal will be of little moment, and I turn to examine it from another point of view.

"It is to be assumed that if the mandate for the government or tutelage of Turkey is given to the United States we will perform our mission with our own men and our own money. Anyone who has even casual knowledge of the conditions prevailing in the Turkish Empire knows that the maintenance of order and the enforcement of the laws and for the tutelage which will accompany the endeavor will require an army of more than a hundred thousand men for many years to come. It will require a civilian force of even more. The fathers and mothers of America will be asked to send their sons 5,000 miles from home to keep the Turk, the Armenian, the Syrian, and the Arab in order and train them for self-government. The civil-service employees in Constantinople will outnumber our employees in Washington. It is safe to assume that the annual cost of this enterprise will exceed a billion dollars. It is all too absurd to contemplate. When the American people reflect upon such a proposal they will reject it with all the emphasis of unanimity.

"I hope that it will not be understood that I have any lack of sympathy for the oppressed and miserable people of that part of the world. Whatever we can do for them to lighten their heavy burdens, to bring hope into their cheerless lives, to inspire them for their independence, we ought to do and will do. Were I asked to name the first thing which seems to have been largely forgotten at Paris—and the best thing which can be done—I would instantly say disarm the Turk, just as we ought to disarm the German, and then allow these people, with all the assistance we can lawfully render, to work out their own salvation; and if salvation is to be permanent, they must work it out for themselves.

"Mr. President, until now I have been discussing articles in the proposed constitution the construction of which seems to have created no difference of opinion. At this time I bring to the attention of the Senate certain provisions which may be said to be somewhat obscure and which were interpeted by the Senator from Illinois. I mean the consequences which may follow the failure of nations to agree upon a nonarbitrable or nonjusticiable controversy. It is perfectly clear that, with respect to such disputes—keep your mind fixed, if you will, upon the classification of disputes. First, there are the disputes which arise between nations and which can be adjudicated by reference to recognized law and established facts. These are issues for courts, and I should like to see an international court permanently established for the disposition of issues or controversies of that character. I am now referring to controversies which arise with respect to the policies of nations, with respect to laws which they pass for the government of their own people, which affect their honor, which affect the lives of the sovereignties themselves—with respect to such disputes, we are asked to agree that there shall be no resort to war without previously submitting them to arbitration or to inquiry by the executive council, and that we are not to go to war with respect to them for a period of three months after the award by the arbitrators or a recommendation by the executive council. I have already said that I am heartily in favor of referring such matters to a body representing the powers of the world and agreeing not to resort to war for settlement until there has been ample opportunity for full, open discussion with every civilized nation on earth. My objection to articles 12, 15, and 16 is not alone that they provide for an award or recommendation by the executive council.

That might be tolerated were it not that we bind ourselves not to resort to war against a member of the league which complies with the award of the arbitrators or the recommendation of the executive council. This agreement is found in both article 12 and article 15. In the last article the language is:

"If the report—

"These are nonjusticiable questions, questions of policy, which are internal in their character—

"If the report is unanimously agreed to by the members of the council other than the parties to the dispute, the high contracting parties agree that they will not go to war with any party which complies with the recommendations, and that if any party shall refuse so to comply the council shall propose measures necessary to give effect to the recommendation.

"Nonjusticiable controversies embrace a wide range. They include disputes over exclusion laws, immigration laws, tariff laws, and scores of other subjects which you will at once have in mind.

"Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

"Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

"Mr. OVERMAN. I notice that the Senator from Iowa throughout his entire speech calls this 'a constitution.' If it is a constitution, what have we to do with it? If it is a league of peace under a treaty we can, of course, ratify or not ratify it, but if it is a constitution, as the Senator says it is, what are we to do with it?

"Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina is better able to answer that question than am I. I have accepted the terminology which the President of the United States has attached to it. He calls it 'a proposed constitution for the league of nations,' and I am but following his high example in referring to it by that name.

"Do not forget that the proposed constitution makes us agree that we will not go to war with any nation which accepts and performs the recommendation of the executive council. The effect of the proposed agreement can be best understood—and I want the close and sympathetic attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to this phase of the matter—the effect of the proposed agreement can be best understood by assuming a concrete instance, and I take one that has been the cause of much ill feeling between Japan and the United States.

"These countries are to be the high contracting parties, and under the agreement Japan would have the right to refer to the executive council our discrimination against the citizens of that country, and the executive council, exclusive of the United States and Japan, would have the right to decide it. Suppose it should be decided against the United States; suppose it should be decided that the United States ought to admit the subjects of Japan not only to our borders but to our citizenship upon the same terms on which we admit the citizens or subjects of Great Britain, France, or Italy? Then the council would recommend that subjects of the Japanese Empire should be admitted to the United States upon the same terms and with the same privileges accorded to the subjects of other nations.

"What then? Follow me now, those who have thought that this article did not contain the seeds of war, dissension, and discord. What then? Japan would say to the world, 'We are complying with the recommendation of the executive council as recited in article 12 and as repeated in article 15.' In these circumstances we have agreed not once, but twice, that we will not resort to war against the complying nation. Japan is the complying nation; and that means that Japanese subjects must be admitted as are the people of other countries. We could not keep them out except through war.

"Moreover, under article 16, if we should go to war in order to exclude them we shall then have committed an act of war against all the other members of the league, which would lead to the severance automatically of all trade or financial relations between our country and the world.

"When we reflect upon the composition of the executive council, it is incredible that a provision of this character should commend itself to the American people.

"A controversy of the same character would arise with regard to the qualifications which we demand for admission into the United States of the inhabitants especially of southern and eastern Europe. The same controversy in character would arise were Great Britain or France or any other country to complain of the tariff laws which we may enact in order to protect the industries of our own land.

"I do not mention the wider, more abstract controversies that would inevitably spring up. These are enough. I want at some time—not now—a Senator who proposes to advise the American people to adopt this constitution precisely as it has come from the hands of the Paris conference to ask the American people whether they are willing that an executive council composed of the five nations which have already been mentioned in the constitution, and four others of whom we do not know, shall pass upon the wisdom of our laws excluding the subjects of certain oriental countries from the United States. I want there to be no doubt with regard to the scope and effect, if not the purpose, of the thing we are asked to undertake, the thing to which we are asked to assent.

"I predict that when you make it fairly known to the people of this country that the validity, the wisdom, and the character of the legislation which we adopt for our own protection and for safeguarding the citizenship of our own country are to be submitted to a tribunal of the world, and that, in the event the decision or recommendation is adverse to us, we must accept it or violate the obligations which we solemnly assume, this proposal will be rejected so emphatically that never again will anyone have the temerity to propose it to a country like ours.

"Mr. President, I must not pursue the analysis further. The constitution of the league as proposed is not a compact among nations to prevent war; it is vastly more than that. It is the creation of a world nation, and if observed it will draw to the executive council and body of delegates so many of the vital powers of government that the remainder will become as unimportant as the jurisdiction of the States in the American Union as compared with the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. This is its purpose. It was not only foreshadowed in the addresses delivered by the President before he went abroad but it is clearly perceived in the report which the President made to the peace conference.

"Other eminent men so understand it. I quote from the newspaper report of a speech made by our distinguished ambassador to Great Britain, delivered in London on Washington's Birthday:

"'George Washington employed the idea of a league of nations in the American constitutional convention,' declared John W. Davis, the American ambassador—

"A man of the clearest mind and a man of commanding ability—

"in a speech at the Washington day dinner of the English-speaking Union. He likened the American colonies with their new-found freedom immediately after the Revolution to the nations of the world today.

"Why attempt to obscure the plain and obvious meaning of the effort which is now being made?

"Mr. President, it will be a sad day for humanity when their affairs pass under the government of a world nation.

"I believe that it is possible for us to do everything that can be done to prevent war without transferring to a foreign power the Government of America. A day or two ago I read the following statement issued by a distinguished company of gentlemen headed by Mr. Taft as they toured the country:

"The war against military autocracy has been won because the great free nations acted together, and its results will be secured only if they continue to act together. The forces making for autocratic rule on the one hand and for violence of Bolshevism on the other are still at work. In 50 years the small State of Prussia so organized central Europe as to defy the world. In the present disorganized state of central and eastern Europe that can be done again on a still larger scale and menace all free institutions.

"This statement is conspicuously unfair and uncandid. It is not necessary to abolish national power; it is not necessary that the authority to govern all the people of the world shall be absorbed by one body of men in order to protect the nations which are springing from the ruins of Europe. All that we need to do is to disarm Germany and permit these nations to accomplish their own destinies and achieve the highest victories of civilization.

"Mr. President, this paper before us—the constitution of the league—presents a strange anomaly; it presents curious, interesting contradictions. It carefully provides a guaranty that would preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of nations as they now exist, and we must fight to do it, no matter when the invasion occurs or how righteous the cause of the invader may be. On the other hand, after we have received the guaranty that our territorial limits shall never be changed nor our independence overthrown, we turn over to an alien body the determination of the character of our citizenship. It would seem that the framers of this remarkable document considered it more important that our territory should remain intact than our right to say what men and women should live within our borders.

"In another aspect, however, the apparent inconsistency is reconciled when it is remembered that the character of our citizens, as compared with the citizens of the world, becomes an immaterial matter, inasmuch as the United States ceases to be distinct, and that the executive council or the body of delegates has the same tender consideration for all parts of its world-wide domain.

"Mr. President, I do not ignore the deep anxiety which the President, as the spokesman for this instrument, feels for the laboring people of the world and his keen desire to see that full justice is done to the people—and I quote him—'who go to bed tired and wake up without the stimulation of lively hope.' They understand their wrongs, and they are moving to correct them; sometimes in the best way, sometimes in the worst way. They need no such league of nations to assert their rights. They have always been strong enough to do it here, and now they are powerful enough to do it everywhere. Just what will come from the turmoil through which the world is now passing God only knows, but we fervently hope that from the conflict justice to every human being will emerge; but a polyglot and incoherent power imposed upon this mass of conflicting and irreconcilable aspirations will do more to plunge all mankind into continual strife than any plan that can be conceived.

"The President repeats over and over again that we must accept our responsibility in world work, and I agree with him. I am no advocate of isolation. It seems plain to me, however, that the chief contribution to peace and good order which we can make at this time is to meet boldly and to solve wisely for ourselves the one mighty question which is tearing Europe asunder and which is advancing upon us with terrific force. If we can not show the world by our own example that the workingman can get more justice, more happiness, more comfort under a reconstructed system of individual industrial activity than he can secure through complete socialism, the world will try the experiment, and, from my standpoint, with the most disastrous results to civilization.

"We ought now to be bending all our energies upon the vital subject of reconstruction, and this should be our immediate contribution to the welfare of humanity.

"Mr. President, our history is full of the noblest inspiration. We entered a trackless continent. We have filled it with the homes of an hundred millions of people; the happiest homes in all the world. We have enriched it with the best farms, the most productive factories, the greatest system of transportation, and the mightiest commerce upon which the sun shines. Our progress has been the wonder and the envy of mankind. We have pursued the path of honor and justice, and it has led us to the highest distinction and the most enduring fame. We have so guarded and cherished the rights of man that our citizenship stands without peer throughout the earth. Our laws are humane, and protect the weak against the aggressions of the strong. With all its mistakes, the Government of the United States has done more for the welfare of its people and more for the enlightenment of the world than any other government ever established among men. We love peace and we will devote all our intelligence, all our efforts, to attain it; but, sir, we will not surrender our right to live under our own institutions, to control our own destiny, to insure the interests of our own citizens, to worship at the shrine of our own patriots to any alien body which the wit of man can conceive. If this be to accept the challenge recently announced, I accept it. I was born an American; I have lived an American; and, God permitting, I will die an American."

APPENDIX 2.

LEAGUE OBSTACLE EXAMPLE SEEN IN CRISIS OVER BANAT—FRANK SIMONDS, IN REVIEWING SITUATION, POINTS TO IT AS ANGLE SO LITTLE UNDERSTOOD IN AMERICA.

[By Frank H. Simonds.]

"The new crisis in the Near East, growing out of the dispute between the Roumanians and the Serbians over the Banat, supplies an admirable example of precisely the kind of obstacle to the league of nations which is so little understood in America and of such profound importance to Europe.

"Roughly speaking, the facts as to the Banat are as follows: This is an old Province of Hungary, lying between the Maros, Theiss, and Danube Rivers. It has an area of approximately 10,000 square miles—that is, about equal to the area of Massachusetts and Rhode Island combined—and a population of one and a half millions In its population are Roumanians, Hungarians, Germans, and Serbians, to name only the four most considerable races. No single race has a majority, although the Roumanians outnumber any other single group.

"CLAIMS PRESENTED.

"This territory is claimed by Hungary on the basis of some thousand years of ownership, together with the presence of a considerable Hungarian minority. It is claimed entirely by the Roumanians, both because they constitute the largest single ethnic group and because it was promised to them in that secret treaty made with Russia, France, Italy, and Great Britain, which brought Roumania into the war. The southwestern corner only is claimed by the Serbians on the unquestioned ground that in this area—the county of Torontal—the Serbs constitute a majority.

"At Paris the Hungarian claim was dismissed. To Roumania was assigned three-quarters of the territory, and to the Serbs the county of Torontal, lying in the angle between the Theiss and the Danube Rivers and facing the Serbian capital of Belgrade. Against this decision of Paris, both the Hungarians and the Roumanians protested. The Hungarian claim has obviously lapsed as a result of the collapse of Hungary and the occupation of Budapest by the Roumanians. By contrast, the Roumanian claim has been immensely strengthened by this same set of circumstances.

"ROUMANIA'S ARGUMENTS.

"Now, it is essential to understand the Roumanian claim, which has been represented in America as unreasonable and unfair. First of all, Roumania came into the war as a result of a specific promise made to her by Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy, and this promise included the whole of the Banat. She was defeated, betrayed by Russia, and compelled to make a separate peace, but her Government maintains that this peace, accepted under duress and repudiated at the first opportunity, did not destroy the validity of the allied pledge.

"In the second place, Roumania points out with justice that economic and geographical reasons alike support her claim in the Banat. On the economic side, to take away the southwest fraction is to put in alien hands practically all the railroad and highway exits from the east and mountainous end of the Banat, which has been assigned to Roumania, and, in addition, to place in alien control both banks of the Theiss and the Danube, which are essential to Roumanian commerce.

"SEEN AS NATURAL DIVISIONS.

"On the geographical side, the Roumanians argue that the great rivers which bound the Banat, the Maros, the Theiss, and the Danube, supply natural frontiers, abolish possibilities of future quarrels and are designed by nature to separate nations.

"They point out that there has been assigned to Italy considerable areas of German-speaking people in the southern Tyrol, in order to give Italy her natural frontier of the Alps, and on the east a similar cession has been made involving several hundred thousand Slovenians, to provide Italy with a fencible frontier in that direction. They point out further that this has been done in accordance with the secret treaty which brought Italy into the war, and they protest that Roumania is entitled to the same treatment Italy has received.

"STAND BY BIG NATIONS.

"What is of at least equal importance is the fact that Italy openly and France tacitly support the Roumanian claims. The Italians are moved by the fact that they have a dispute with the southern Slavs over Fiume and the Dalmatian coast. Anything that strengthens the southern Slavs contributes new force to a future enemy which already disclosed its purpose to challenge Italians to get it, and of Trieste and those Slav hinterlands which the Italians have already received at Paris.

"The French, on their part, while championing the Jugoslav cause in the matter of Fiume, sympathize with Roumania not merely because the Roumanian Army has been reorganized by French officers, but also because Roumania has become a considerable factor in the balance of power of Europe, and the French are unwilling to risk driving Roumania into German hands merely to extend the application of the doctrine of self-determination to the Banat.

"SERBS ARE DETERMINED.

"The Serbs have occupied the Torontal district in accordance with the decision of Paris. They have announced their purpose to defend it, and they have rejected the Roumanian compromise proposal, which included an agreement on the part of Roumania to cede certain territory to the Bulgarians in the Dobruja and persuade the Bulgarians on their part to make compensating concessions to the Serbs about Widin.

"The result of the Serbian decision has been the revival of a Roumanian claim to certain Serbian districts south of the Danube about the Iron Gate, facing the old Roumanian territory, in which the population is overwhelmingly Roumanian. If the rule of self-determination is to be applied against the Roumanians in the Banat, Bucharest demands that it shall be applied equally rigidly to Roumanian benefit south of the Danube.

"ANTICIPATED ACTION.

"Before I left Paris I was told by my Roumanian friends that in due course of time Roumanian divisions would be sent to the Banat, and that under no circumstances would Roumania consent to a division of this Province. Apparently this has now happened. By their occupation of Budapest the Roumanians have disposed of the Hungarian problem. Hungarian armies are demobilized.

"Moreover, on the Bessarabian frontier they have about reached a settlement with the Ukrainians. They can, therefore, send a number of well-equipped divisions into the Banat. Moreover, they can be sure that if the Serbs resist, Roumania will have the support of Italy, not impossibly accompanied by Italian military operations in Dalmatia and east of Trieste. She can also enlist Bulgarian assistance by a small concession in the Dobrudja and a promise to support Bulgarian claims in Macedonia.

"As far as the conference of Paris is concerned, the Roumanians know that they will be supported by the Italians; that the French will under no circumstances agree to supply troops to be used against them; and they are equally confident that neither the United States nor Great Britain is ready to send a hundred thousand troops to the Danube to fight to vindicate the decision of the conference of Paris as to the possession of the county of Torontal.

"SEEN AS 14 POINTS' PERIL.

"We have, then, at once a clear example of the ultimate peril involved in the rigid application of one of the 14 points. To have assigned the Torontal to Roumania might possibly have aroused temporary resentment on the part of the Serbs, but with the Italian quarrel on their hands it could not have led to conflict.

"Presenting the Serbs with something they can not defend, and thereby insuring the hostility of a State which will always be stronger, has proved a questionable piece of generosity. It may yet prove one of the most fatal gifts in history, since the Serb now finds himself involved in quarrels with all his neighbors, with the exception of the Greeks, all of whom could easily and conveniently make a common cause against him and could find in that common cause the opportunity for abolishing differences existing between one another. Thus, Hungary, Roumania, Italy, and Bulgaria might easily crush Serbia, partition the Jugo-Slav State among themselves, and repeat in a small way the Austro-Prussian-Russian policy as to Poland nearly a century and a half ago.

"Moreover, we see also the reappearance of a great power, namely, Italy, making use of a Balkan complication precisely as Russia and Austria used the Balkan States in all the years preceding the World War. The theory that Paris could solve questions like that of the Banat, the belief that the principles expressed in the 14 points and in the league of nations would govern, are disclosed to be fallacious, and there is every possibility that we may see actual military conflict once more breaking out in the Balkans in consequence of the decision of the Paris conference in the matter of the Banat."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the frank statement of the Senator from Iowa of his opposition to article 10, based upon the conception that America ought not to be bound in the future to take the responsibility of cooperating to restrain an aggressive nation invading the territorial integrity of another or its existing political independence is a point of view which is easily understood, with the simple explanation the Senator has given that he does not want any nation to impose its will upon the United States and that he thinks aggressive wars of conquest may under some circumstances be commendable. But, Mr. President, I favor article 10 for the very reason that I think it is right now, that aggressive war is wrong, that it can be prevented by this covenant, and I do not recognize the obligations of article 10 as permitting any nation to impose its will on America. I wish America to express its own will now under article 10 and maintain it on the ground the principle of article 10 is fundamentally right; that the nations of the world should have their territorial integrity unimpaired; that they should have their political independence unimpaired; and because I believe that, and because I believe that when the United States and all the nations of the earth practically combine to make it effective that sound, honest principle will be permanent on earth; that the territorial integrity of no nation will ever be invaded with that agreement once entered into in this covenant, because I believe that the political independence of no nation will ever be disturbed under the conditions of this proposed covenant, I favor it, and I favor it now, and I am willing to say now that that ought to be the rule forever on earth. I am willing to vote for it, as a servant of the American people, knowing that I am serving them and representing the will of the overwhelming majority of the common people, who, after all, pay the costs of war in life and in property.

After all, under article 10 the council may only advise if there should be a war of invasion in spite of this overwhelming power of mankind organized to prevent it, if by any remote possibility any nation in the future had the temerity, in the face of all mankind and in the face of the organized powers of the world, to invade unlawfully and wrongfully the territorial integrity of another nation or its political independence. If that should by any possibility happen, and the question arises as to what ought to be done about it, and if the complete commercial and financial boycott provided does not restrain such offender, and then further steps should be taken, advice would be given by the council.

The advice of the council must be unanimous to reach a decision. On the council the United States would be represented, and 9 other nations would be represented. If those 10 representatives, including the representative of the United States, unanimously agree upon the advice, I have faith enough in the intelligence of mankind, in the honesty and in the uprightness and the judgment of the 10 great representatives of the great nations who will be in that council to believe that their advice will be sound and worthy to be followed. In the event of the doubly impossible contingency that some nation defied the whole world, defied the world boycott, and force of arms were required, and, finally, the advice were wrong, coming from the council with the consent of our own representative, it would still be possible for the United States to say, if the facts truly justified it, "The advice is unsound, and we are not morally or legally obliged to do a thing which is unreasonable or foolish." Congress, in any event, would be obliged to take such action as it found right, but our duty is to safeguard the peace of the world by article 10. In my opinion it will suffice and make wars impossible and cost the world nothing. The Monroe doctrine deterred the European monarchies from invading the western democracies, and article 10 is a thousand times as powerful as a force deterring nations from aggressive war.

But, Mr. President, there is something far more than this. All the dreadful happenings of the future which the imagination may conjure up are themselves absolutely impossible to occur, because the whole world now is moving most rapidly toward government of the people, by the people, and for the people. The ideals of Europe are changed and changing daily for the better. The old autocracies are completely broken down, the Bourbons are long since gone, the Romanoffs are destroyed, the Hohenzollerns are eliminated, the Hapsburgs are utterly powerless, the old order passes away; and even the Vatican, which has in the past centuries favored autocracy, in a letter from the Pope himself, has declared in favor of democracy and the education of the people. If there is on earth a chamber where there is collected the wisdom of mankind with regard to the conditions of every nation of the earth, it is in the College of the Propaganda. There is assembled the most intimate knowledge of the conditions of every nation on earth, and when the Vatican declares for democracy the days of autocracy are gone. The threat of world dominancy by autocracy is dead and buried, never to be resurrected.

The monarchs of Bulgaria and Turkey are gone. The nominal titles that remain in Europe now of "king" are without power. They are merely the symbols of the past, retained out of the affection for the past. The titles of the King of Norway, of Sweden, of Denmark, of Queen of Holland, of King of Belgium, of King of England are merely forms. They are no longer of profound substance.

There is one Government in Europe based on democracy, surrounded by belligerent powers—Switzerland, one-third German speaking, one-third Italian speaking, and one-third French speaking, and yet having a stability in government that has remained unshaken decade after decade, when Europe was shaken with wars. The Balkan wars never touched Switzerland; the war of 1870–71 did not touch Switzerland; this war, with Switzerland surrounded on all sides by warring nations, did not invade the land of Switzerland; and with its boundaries fixed, with a government of a democracy, with all its laws submitted to the people in Switzerland by a referendum, so that no law should go into effect without the will of the people of Switzerland, have given it a stability that makes Switzerland a model to the world. No desire to increase their boundaries and no desire to infringe their boundary has appeared.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. No man rejoices more on account of the millennium of democracy approaching than I do. It seems to me the Senator from Oklahoma, in view of the beautiful picture he has just painted, might trust these democracies not to declare unjust war. Why, then, should we enter into an agreement to protect the boundaries of all the nations of the world? Why not give to each of these democracies, springing from the people, guided by the people, some opportunity to work out their own salvation?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator a few moments ago said he would choose his company. I am pointing out to him the very excellent company he will choose and the company which I do choose in supporting the covenant of the league.

I choose an alliance with them. I am glad to make it with them. I have confidence in them. I believe in them. I have the faith to believe. I believe in the judgment of mankind, in the common sense of mankind, and I want to say to the Senator that it makes but little difference where the line of a territory is drawn if that territory be governed by the will of the people who inherit it, and that is why I pointed out Switzerland, one-third French, one-third German, and one-third Italian, living happily together under popular government.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. In order to get the Senator's view a little more explicitly with reference to the obligations of article 10, assume that China should in time find herself and assume a status as a military power, and that China should undertake, with her army and navy, to assist Korea to gain her independence, what does the Senator think the obligation of the United States would be under article 10 as it now stands?

Mr. OWEN. I will reply to the Senator very frankly and very freely. To start on, China is the greatest democracy in the world. China governs every village by the voice of the people of the village. China follows a rule laid down for village life and family life that is 2,000 years old. If there is a stable government on earth in a democratic sense, it is the Government of China. The idea of China invading the territory of Korea for the purpose of restoring Korea to independence is entirely unthinkable, because of China's own mental attitude, in the first place, and second, because under the covenant the restraints fixed would provide a forum for Korea's grievances and would prevent China's invasion.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it any more unthinkable than the United States assisting Cuba to gain her independence?

Mr. OWEN. It is.

Mr. LENROOT. Why?

Mr. OWEN. For the reason that now if this covenant goes into effect, assuring the territorial integrity of nations and the existing political independence of nations, and Korea having a grievance as far as Japan is concerned, Korea has the opinion of mankind to appeal to through this league, and China is restrained by article 10.

I remind the Senator that section 23, paragraph B, of the league, pledges every nation including Japan, including Great Britain, to deal justly with any native inhabitants under their control.

Mr. LENROOT. Following that a little further, does the Senator then think that the league would have a right to deal, we will say, with the negro question in the United States?

Mr. OWEN. I think the people of the United States will have the wisdom and the justice to deal kindly and fairly——

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, the Senator begs the question——

Mr. OWEN. With the negro question and make it entirely——

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is too good a lawyer to attempt to beg the question in that way.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator would draw a parallel, I take it, between Korea and the negro question?

Mr. LENROOT. I am speaking now of the jurisdiction of the league of nations.

Mr. OWEN. The jurisdiction of the league of nations is confined to international affairs, and the league is not permitted to interfere in domestic questions.

Mr. LENROOT. But is not Korea a domestic affair of Japan?

Mr. OWEN. It is not, in my opinion.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I interrupt the Senator at that point to ask a question?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. The President the other day adverted to the powers of the league under article 11 to settle a domestic question, so called. If it were possible for the league to consider the status of the inhabitants of Ireland, would it not also be possible for the league to consider the status of some of the people of the United States—the negroes, for example?

Mr. OWEN. I think the entire world would agree that affairs affecting our citizens of African blood is so purely a domestic question that it would be impossible to raise it before the league, but if it were possible to raise it I think that the United States can be entirely relied on to so conduct its affairs that its conduct would meet with the cordial approval of the opinion of civilized mankind. The United States has always so managed its affairs, and I think always will do so. I have no fear of the negro bugaboo whatever. It indicates great poverty of argument against the covenant.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has repeated the argument which has been very often used, that when we once form the league of nations Japan can be forced to do right with reference to China and with reference to Shantung. As we all know, Japan had a secret treaty with England, with France, with Italy, and with Russia. England, France, and Italy will be three of the nations——

Mr. OWEN. I do not believe there was a treaty with Russia of the character referred to.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; there was a treaty with Russia; but that is not consequential so far as my inquiry is concerned. If those three nations are not now willing to do justice to China, why will they be more willing to do justice to China after they join the league than they are now? They will be members of the council. They now are unwilling to do justice to China. They now are unwilling to see that Shantung is given back to China, and they are standing for that grab, that steal, as I believe, of Shantung by Japan, and they are doing it by virtue of a secret treaty. They say so squarely, and the President of the United States has said that because of the secret treaty that Japan had with England and that Japan had with France he was unable to get either England or France to pay any attention to the Shantung proposition. He said that while he was talking with the Japanese representative on these questions, always the representatives of England and France were over in the other part of the room and declined to enter into the conversation. Furthermore, he has specifically said that he was practically forced into that proposition. If that be true, and if they had those secret treaties, why are they going to be willing to do justice to China with reference to Shantung after they come into the league when they are not willing to do it now?

Mr. OWEN. I will tell the Senator if he will permit me.

Mr. WATSON. I will.

Mr. OWEN. We use the word "they" somewhat loosely. We talk about Great Britain and France and Italy as if they were individuals severally standing upon the floor before us, to whom we could speak as we would to a man.

The power of Great Britain represents the various factors that take part in British life. It represents the old tory element, the old conservative element, the more liberal elements, the great body of the liberal elements of Great Britain, and, finally, those who are on the extreme left. The governing power in Great Britain, however, I believe, will be finally found to be the "public opinion" of the people of Great Britain under the mechanism of the government which they have, which will express itself in due season as the possibility arises.

Mr. WATSON rose.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator must allow me to answer, because I have just started to answer, and then I will answer any other question he wishes to ask.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. Therefore, when we speak of these nations we must remember the terminology we use—that we are not speaking of an individual but we are speaking of a people whose voice will be heard when the occasion and the opportunity arise and the mechanism is afforded. The same thing is true of France; the same thing is true of Italy; the same thing is true in the United States, for that matter. When the covenant of the league is established, when the world meets around a council table where the whole world may hear the open discussion of the rights of the Chinese people in Shantung, and with regard to Shantung and with regard to Hongkong and Shanghai and Kochin China, these things will be modified in time by the constantly improving intelligence and knowledge of mankind.

The world is fundamentally sound. There is such a thing as conscience in man, whether he be a Chinaman, a European, or an American, and that thing of conscience knows what is right and what is wrong and will judge the case aright when the facts are laid before the assembly, the place where the opinion of mankind may be given publicity.

I therefore take it that in due season, if you permit a forum to be established where the opinion of mankind may make itself felt, the Shantung incident will slowly adjust itself on the principles of justice and of righteousness. But if you refuse to permit a forum to be established, if you defeat this covenant, you have no remedy except force. Therefore, those who would deal justly with China will take the settlement which goes so far as to return all except the commercial concessions and leave the commercial concessions to be adjusted before the public opinion of the world when the facts shall be presented in due time.

I yield for any other question the Senator may wish to ask.

Mr. WATSON. In other words, the Senator is waiting for that far-off millennium——

Mr. OWEN. I hope the Senator does not speak irreverently.

Mr. WATSON. No; but that far-off millennium when conscience is going to control the actions of all the men and all nations and the representatives of all nations.

Mr. OWEN. I do have faith in it. It is not far off. It is here now.

Mr. WATSON. Is China to wait for the restoration of Shantung until that beautiful millennium is ushered in?

Mr. OWEN. I think China will not have to wait. The Senator knows very well that Japan has entered into an engagement with the other nations of the world to return the sovereignty of Shantung and is only proposing to retain the commercial concessions, and it is the "commercial concessions" which I say can be adjusted in this forum after the other matter is disposed of.

Mr. WATSON. But the Senator does not believe—I call myself the Senator—that Japan intends to restore Shantung.

Mr. OWEN. I most undoubtedly do.

Mr. WATSON. Then that is a question that we will have to wait to determine. I do not believe that she does. I do not believe that she intends to restore Shantung unless compelled to do so by the aroused conscience and morality of the world.

Mr. OWEN. I do not believe it necessary to needlessly insult an ally who was willing to fight on the side of liberty in this war.

Mr. WATSON. How much did they fight?

Mr. OWEN. I would wait a few months, until Japan can act, before I insulted an ally that had been faithful——

Mr. WATSON. Before you insult an ally that has been faithful, and yet while the Chinamen were suffering and bleeding on the battle field that ally had a secret arrangement to rob and plunder China when the war was over. And yet the Senator talks about poor Japan!

Mr. OWEN. I have not said "poor Japan." I have great admiration for Japan, even if some of her statesmen may be of poor vision and may make some errors on the material side.

Mr. WATSON. I am talking about China. I do not know what the——

Mr. OWEN. I have greater admiration for China.

Mr. WATSON. It is a great thing to admire her and at the same time plunder her of one of her richest Provinces, and at the same time we stand sponsor for it.

Here is what I want to ask the Senator: Under the secret agreement between England and Japan, Japan was to have Shantung. The Senator understands that?

Mr. OWEN. I do not understand it.

Mr. WATSON. Under that same secret agreement, when the war was over and they were dividing the loot before the victory was won, England was to have all the German islands in the Pacific Ocean south of the Equator. When that day of enlightened conscience and glorified reason, of which the Senator speaks, is ushered in, will England give up those island possessions when Japan gives up Shantung, because England got those islands as a consideration for Japan getting Shantung? Is England going to surrender her possessions? Does the Senator believe England will surrender anything?

Mr. OWEN. As between England and Germany, I prefer that the islands of the sea were under the jurisdiction of the British Government.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely.

Mr. OWEN. Because I have great confidence in the ability of that Government to improve and develop the art of self-government.

Mr. WATSON. But the Senator must remember that as a part of this same agreement by which England got these islands Japan got Shantung.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, we may admit, as a mere matter of argument, that that agreement was highly improper.

Yet I will say to the Senator that when the English people were in this life-and-death struggle and it became of urgent importance that the troopships coming from New Zealand and Australia should not be waylaid by the German submarines and the German cruisers on the Pacific, certain English statesmen made such a bargain with Japan as they could; but I again remind the Senator that when you speak of "England" and "they," remember it is a very vague term, and that in the future the power in control of England will not be the conservatives or the tories, but more and more the liberal elements, who have for a long time really dominated English policies, and will in future assuredly do so. So even an agreement that was improper may confidently be expected to be corrected as far as justice may require.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, this is the day set for voting on the so-called Fall amendments, and I should like to inquire whether we can now proceed with the vote?

Mr. WATSON. My understanding is—and if I am wrong the Senator will correct me—that there was an agreement between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that all of the treaty, including the Fall amendments, should be read before any voting should begin. Am I right?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There was no agreement to that effect. The agreement I had with the Senator from Massachusetts was that we should proceed with the reading of the treaty to some extent so as to cover the Fall amendments before the address of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], but that was modified afterwards. If we can now proceed without interruption with the reading of the treaty, I suppose that would be the proper thing to do; but I do not want to do away with the vote on the Fall amendments to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think we ought to know now just exactly what the understanding was. There was first a motion made to postpone, as I remember, not a vote but to postpone consideration. Therefore, I do not understand that necessarily the matter of voting comes up to-day, but merely the consideration. Then, there was a unanimous request afterwards made as to the effect of which I am not entirely sure; and I wish that we could have the RECORD before us so as to know just exactly what was intended and what the status now is.

Mr. SMOOT. The unanimous-consent agreement was simply to reduce the period of postponement from a week to three days.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; but not for the vote, as I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. For the consideration of the Fall amendments.

Mr. WATSON. For the consideration of the Fall amendments. I do not understand that the Senator from New Mexico is to be compelled, if he does not so choose, to cease speaking to-day, for his speech will probably take some time. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is now present and can state the situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think if we have the RECORD, there can be no possible mistake. My understanding is the same as that of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that we were merely to postpone the consideration of the amendments.

Mr. WATSON. That is all.

Mr. LODGE. There was no agreement whatever about voting.

Mr. WATSON. I thought not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think not.

Mr. LODGE. There was no suggestion of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the RECORD here.

Mr. LODGE. The RECORD will show that what I have stated is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I see from this morning's paper that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] seems to have "had a call" to go back to the field, in order to convince the people of the United States that the resolution which he had offered as an amendment to the treaty is right. When I saw that statement, I was not very much astonished. I thought from the magnificent crowds and the tumultuous applause which had greeted the President of the United States when he was explaining to great popular audiences that amendment and various others whose intention was to emasculate, if not to destroy, the treaty that the Senator from California would find it perhaps advisable, if not necessary, to go back to California, if not for the purpose of continuing the attack upon the President of the United States, at least for the purpose of reducing and mending his fences.

Mr. President, I have received the letter which I hold in my hand, which I wish to read to the Senate. The letter is as follows:

LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE,
New York, September 17, 1919.

DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: Attached is some material that would read well in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, especially the round robin from California with 12 of its signers on JOHNSON'S California presidential campaign committee. All of the 28 signers are "big folks" in California.

Faithfully, yours, W. R. BOYD, Jr.

Mr. Boyd is the national campaign manager of the League to Enforce Peace.
